WAR IMPOSSIBLE. Why a Conflict with England Could

Not Take Place. The possibility of war between England and America, the two great English-speaking, civilized and civilizing powers of the world, is certainly regarded on this side of the Atlantic, and additional heats paced Monday in the probably on both, as infinitely remote. During the height of the so-called Venezuelan crisis a little more than a year ago nothing was more remarkable than the calm and pacific tone in relation thereto shown by the English people ing of the commission of a flying squadron, evoked by the now historic telegram of the German emperor. All this is now ancient history. But the difference in feeling was clear and unmistakable. Every Englishman believes in the unfortunate possibility of an Anglo-European war. No Englishman believes in the real possibility of an Anglo-American war. The two countries are united by ties of blood, religion and language. They have vast financial and commercial relations. They would, in the event of war-whatever its resultinterests, territorial or otherwise-Can-field. In the fitth, Dell, $10, the field, ada not excepted-sufficient to justify such an international calamity. All these circumstances should combine to render such an event impossible. These considerations directly affect my argument. Half the exports from the United States to England are, in fact, breadstuffs, and of this commodity alone her. these exports supply more than onethird of our yearly national consumption. To deprive American wheat producers and grain shippers of their most valuable market would inflict material injury on American prosperity, Let us suppose that a combination of European powers against England declared food to be contraband of war. Such a declaration of international law has generally been opposed to American policy on general international grounds. For the special reasons mentioned above, and again to quote Mr. Balfour, "this theoretical prepossession would be stimulated by the strongest motives of personal interest." At the same time it may be remarked that Uncle Sam would hardly declare war in order to enforce this view except for his own hand .- North American Re-

THE MAKING OF DIAMONDS. What the Product of the Laboratory Looks Like.

At the Royal institution recently Mr. William Crookes delivered a lecture on "Diamonds." He said that, thanks to Prof. Moissan, diamonds could now be manufactured in the laboratoryminutely microscopic, it was true, but with crystalline form and appearance, color, hardness and action on light the same as the natural gem. The first necessity was to select pure iron and to pack it in a carbon crucible with pure charcoal from sugar. Half a pound of Kittitas Ranger distanced; time, 2 24 this iron was put into the body of the electric furnace, and a powerful arc, abclose above it between carbon poles. The iron rapidly melted and saturated utes' heating to a temperature above at the 100-yard post instead of the 150 was stopped and the dazzling, fiery tioned. Franzer declared that his asser crneible plunged in cold water until it tion was sustained by the rules of both the liquid to the solid state; hence the expansion of the inner liquid on solidifying produced an enormous pressure, dense, crystalline form-in fact, as dia- say, Childs and Glassford. mond. To obtain the diamond from the metallic ingot required a long and tedious process of treatment with various strong reagents, and the specimens thus obtained were only microscopie The largest artificial diamond yet made was less than one millimeter across. Many circumstances pointed to the conclusion that the diamond of the chemist and the diamond of the mine were strangely akin in origin, and the diamond genesis must have taken place at great depths under high pressure. How the great diamond pipes came into existence was not difficult to understand. from below, and the diamonds, formed at some epoch too remote to imagine, were thrown out with a mud volcano, together with all kinds of debris eroded from adjacent rocks. According to another theory the diamond was a direct gift from heaven, conveyed to earth in meteoric showers, and the so-called volcanie pipes simply holes bored in the earth by the impact of monstrous meteors. - London Times.
