of the eternal Henry Heppner Hills, the peach trees are in bloom Hills, the peach trees are in bloom and all nature smiles. The yellow-vested meadow-lark pours forth his sweetest song, beginning with the first suspicion of daylight, while the dewdrops gleam and glisten on the grass-blades these magnificent mornings, and the robin-redbreast warbles his evening hymn long after the sun has ing hymn long after the sun has dipped down in the west. Joaquin Miller has traveled far and wide, and when he walked afield here the other morning he said that nowhere else do the larks and robins sing so sweetly. There is no impediment in their speech, no stuttering in their songs.

A climb to the tops of the higher hills encircling Heppner in later afternoon gives an inspiring view of the grand old Cascade range and its snowy sentinels, and as this is not a land where it is always afternoon, the sunset's golden glow comes on, and the lingering lights and loitering tints merge into the afterglow and present a peaceful of the grand old Cascade range and picture not found in books.
