ADVERTISING PAYS.

Some physicians are finally beginning to see the advantages derived from advertising on a large scale; and why not, since they derive their revenue from the public? They long held to the idea that they can conduct their practice without expending money for printer's ink, and probably they would continue to do so were it not for the fact that the fake doctors, as they are generally called, are beginning to make great inroads on the practice of the resident physician. Every few weeks we are visited by some "specialist" who takes out several hundred dollars and does it by merely telling the public what he can do. It is false modesty on the part of a physician to say that he does not consider advertising dignified. The real question is a matter of dollars and cents. At this time when patent medicines are on the market that will cure anything from a "corn to a mortgage on your property", the wise doctor will begin to tell what he can do with his paraphernalia and his store of wisdom and experience.—[Arlington Independent.]
