Wenceslaus continued his conversation about the need for new railroads, pointing out that the existing lines were inadequate for the growing population and commerce. He suggested that the government should invest in better transportation infrastructure, which would also boost the local economy. The mayor agreed, stressing the importance of connectivity for the county and the region.

The mayor and Wenceslaus shook hands over the business-like atmosphere of the meeting. Wenceslaus promised to send detailed reports on the proposed rail routes and funding sources to the mayor for further discussion and approval.

In the end, both parties emerged satisfied with the progress made during the meeting, and they looked forward to further discussions on the matter.
