

Era of Industrial Expansion.

Advices from the East state that the rush of "colonists" to the Pacific Coast since the inauguration of special rates is far in excess of any previous movement of this nature. It is the opinion of railroad men, who keep in closest touch with the factors entering into this business, that no small portion of this increase is due to the magnificent advertising given the entire Pacific Coast through the Lewis and Clark Expedition. This, of course, was one of the results expected when the patriotic Oregonians subscribed the money that started the great enterprise, but it is doubtful if the most optimistic of our people expected such an overwhelming success from an advertising standpoint. The cooks and knockers, who, like the poor, are always with us, quite naturally damned the usual long face and predicted a terrible slump at the close of the Fair. Acting on their advice, a great many people postponed purchasing property which was actually needed for business and residential purposes, hoping to secure it at greatly reduced prices as soon as the anticipated slump in values took place. They have waited too long, and never again will it be possible to secure such gains in any kind of property as were on the real estate counters when the Fair opened. And, in spite of the advance already secured, the movement steadily increases, and, with so much new capital coming into the country, values are certain to reach much higher figures. What is true of the situation in the city is also true of the country, for on the prosperity of the country the city is helplessly dependent, and can never grow or prosper unless similar growth and prosperity is in evidence in the country. Not all of the colonists that are now coming into the West will remain with us, for with them will be numbered a few of the same stripe as our own croakers. This class has been joining and going since the days of Whitman and McLoughlin. The country had no charms for their predecessors fifty years ago, and it has none for them to lay, but there are enough coming who recognize the advantages of this country to offset all of the knocking that can be done by those who do not. Oregon, Washington and Idaho are now marketing a grain crop which, after making due allowance for the requirements for seed and home consumption, will add to the circulating medium in the three states more than $30,000,000. The lumber output of the three states for 1915 will exceed by hundreds of millions of feet the output of any previous year. The wool clip and the hop yield also broke all previous records, and the annual creation of new wealth by the products of the field, forest and farm in the three states is greater per capita than that of any other region in the United States. All this has been accomplished while we labored under a handicap of insufficient transportation, and now that we are about to be provided with means for opening up to settlement and development regions of greater extent and equal richness with those which have made such a remarkable showing, both city and country throughout the three states will grow more rapidly than ever before. Long before the effect of the enormous expenditures which the railroad companies will make in providing new lines has been exhausted, we shall begin reap the richer and permanent returns which will follow the development of the vast country that is now lying dormant. Portland and the entire Pacific Northwest are on the eve of a period of industrial expansion and prosperity such as we have never before known, not even in the palmiest days of the Villard boom, which suffered limitations such as are impossible with that which is now coming—Oregonian.
