The case decided by Judge Bean last week against the Washington Pipe and Foundry Co., and in favor of the city of Ione, is of considerable importance. Action was brought to recover $1,600 on account of pipe for Ione's water system, furnished by the contractor who put in the water works. The city settled with the contractor. Under the statute of 1903, it is the duty of the city to take a bond to protect laborers and material men. The city of Ione failed to take the necessary bond, and action was brought on that account. The court held in the trial of the action, that the city took a bond, but did not cover the points required by the statute, but that the council acted in a judicial capacity, and that the city was not liable because the bond was not taken as required by statute. The city of Ione was represented by Redfield & Van Vactor of this city, and W. H. Wilson, of The Dalles, appeared for the Washington Pipe and Foundry Co.

A remarkable sight, but one not altogether new in Seattle, was seen at the stockyards there a short time ago, when 72 head of beef cattle were shod, quite a number of journeyman blacksmiths putting in a day on the work. The cattle were for shipment by boat to Valdez, Alaska, from where they are to be driven 380 miles to Fairbanks. To shoe them the steers are run into a "stock" orling, and then swung up on the same principle as the machine with which an unruly horse is swung up for shoeing. Owing to the split hoof, two shoes are used on each foot, making eight in a set, that weighs three and a half to four pounds, five small nails being used in each shoe. Two men work at one time, one on a front, the other on a rear foot. Shod in this manner, it is said cattle can stand the trip over rough trails with no harm to the feet and little loss of flesh, where otherwise it would be almost impossible. The steers were a fine lot, purchased in the Palouse country and when they reach Fairbanks are worth about $1000 each to their owners. And that certainly means high prices for beef steaks.—Rural Spirit.

Easter Marks the Advent of Spring

It isn't so much WHEN you buy New Spring Clothing as WHERE you get it.

To the man who doesn't know, it seems to make no difference where he buys. But it does. There is as much difference in clothing as is possible to imagine. We're glad we are on the right side of the fence. If we got started talking about our new showing of Spring Goods, we would hardly know where to stop—might make the editor print an extra page or two. At the same time you can see more in five minutes with your own eyes than we could tell you on five pages.

NOW ABOUT WHEN? This is the best time to look over the stock, while the styles are all new and goods fresh.
