Dough Mixing Machine.

In the dough mixer herewith shown, designed by a Kansas man, the work is not only made easier and done more effectively than by spoon or hand, but the dough need not be touched by the fingers. The mixer consists of a cylindrical vessel with a removable cap and a sieve in the cap. In the bottom of the cylinder is a block with a tapered bore, in which a central shaft running through the cap rotates. Projecting from this central shaft below the cap are arms with long, thin, vertical paddles attached. The flour and other ingredients are poured through the sieve, and by turning the handle that operates the shaft the paddles mix the contents of the receptacle thoroughly until it is of the proper consistency. The result is a better dough than can be mixed by beating with spoon or knife.
