Sunday Closing of Saloons.

District Attorney Manning notifies the saloons of Portland that they must close, and remain closed, on Sundays. The state law is explicit in its requirements that no liquor shall be sold on Sundays, though there is no local ordinance to that effect under the Portland charter. The Oregonian thinks the district attorney has abundant authority for his action, and it thinks too that the saloon proprietors will make a grave error if they resist. In any conflict between them and the law there can be only one result. The public is in no humor just now to have the plain provisions of law trifled with by the saloons or by any element of society. The law for Sunday closing of saloons has been on the statute books many years, but it has never been enforced in Portland, chiefly because the public was indifferent and the authorities had their own reasons for non-action. But there is now a movement all over the land for the strict regulation and control of the saloon. It is part of the great moral uplift that is going on everywhere, having its inspiration largely from Washington in the enlightened Roosevelt. Saloon licenses are being raised by many of the cities, and in are shut on Sunday. Seattle and Ta-
