That "New York to Paris" Railway. Apparently Americans will be able to reach Paris by airship before the mooted all rail route via a Bering strait tunnel is open for business. Mr. A. H. Brooks of the United States geological survey discusses the railway scheme in connection with other Alaskan railroad projects and concludes that while the tunneling of the strait would not be impossible as an engineering feat, the cost would be virtually prohibitive.

Were the railways of both hemispheres built to the headlands on each side the ice floes would prevent ferringe across the strait at least seven months of the year, and railway communication would be broken mean while without a tunnel. The expense of building extensions to the far north in Alaska and Siberia would be heavy, and there would be no business for these lines unless the difficulty of spanning the strait is solved. When scanned in detail Mr. Brooks concludes that this intercontinental railway profect is impracticable.
