A New Curiosity Shop.
Since the consolidation of the traction lines of Manhattan and Bronx boroughs of Greater New York a vast and varied assortment of "lost property" is gathered under one roof. As to the quantity, it is estimated that at least 500 articles are picked up by responsible custodians every day on the street car lines and railroad trains and ferryboats which empty their passengers into the heart of the metropolis. The number picked up and carried off by unscrupulous persons cannot be known, but it is considerable.

In variety the things found by transit employees and turned over to the "lost property" department resembles the assortment to be seen in a pawnbroker's bargain window. Watches, jewelry and wallets, likewise gloves, furs and umbrellas, do not seem out of place in this flotam and jetsam of city life. These articles of daily use are naturally dropped or laid down and forgotten in the confusion of travel. Rain coats, overcoats and novels, too, when not in use, are easily overlooked for the moment until it is too late to go back and search the boat or car where the owner remembers to have had them last. Another class of "mislaid" articles suggests that the owner lost himself and that his property, having more poise, stayed put. Bundles of schoolbooks strapped together, picks, shovels and other cumbersome tools carried by workmen are among the curiosities of the collection. Dogs and cats seem to belong there, for they can help lose themselves. But it would be supposed that caged parrots would be able to call an absentminded owner to his or her senses. From the manner in which a newly arrived immigrant clings to his trunk or chest, often even sitting on it in transit, the mislaying of his earthly all by one recently must be set down to a panic and nothing less.

The mother tells her heedless child he would lose his "head if it were not tied on," and the curiosity shop, where claimants hunt for lost property, has daily proof that adults are every whit as heedless as youngsters. People who travel as a business, so to speak, seem now and then to forget that they are not in their own dooryard and that the surest way to have their odds and ends where they'll be found when wanted is to keep a grip on them from the journey's beginning to the journey's end.
