A FEW MINUTES WITH THE EDITOR

HEROES

The men and women commonly called heroes usually become so through actions brought out in times of great stress or excitement, or on the spur of the moment, with no time to consider the danger, discomfort or personal loss caused by their action. This will apply to the army, navy and private life. There are a great many so-called heroes. They are found among the rich and the poor, the godly and ungodly, the moral and the criminal elements of society. The world seldom calls one a hero under circumstances other than that suggested. Yet there are men and women daily working among us, unhonored and unsung, who are far more worthy of the title of hero than many who are popularly known by that title. Let us see:

The Mother

An aged mother, now nearing her ninetieth year, sixty or more years ago was left with the support of an invalid husband and a band of little children on her hands, starvation staring them in the face. Physically unable to do manual labor, she took up the profession of journalism. The editors of that day, and the majority of business men, too, taunted, scoffed and sneered at her efforts. For years she was the laughing stock of the country, but she went heroically on about her business, advocating the rights of women as well as men, earning an honest living for herself and family and standing steadfastly for what she believed to be right. She has lived to see the very things she alone fought for receiving the support of the majority of intelligent men and women. She fought alone and against great odds and finally won out. Yet she has never been rated as a hero.

The Pioneer

A bright, happy young woman was married to a pioneer stockman. With a poor team, an old wagon, a few household goods and a few calico dresses, a few blankets and groceries, a dog under the wagon and a long barreled rifle in it, they started out to look for a home. They located on a little creek twenty miles from the nearest neighbor, a hundred miles from the nearest doctor, store or postoffice. Indians were occasional visitors. A little patch was fenced for garden. When Will was gone (and that was most of the time) Susan was alone, except for the dog and the long-barreled rifle. Weeks would pass and not a human face would Susan see. She was almost glad when the Indian war broke out. It at least made a break in the monotony of her life. One day little George arrived. Will was at home as much as a week at a time then. As he was leaving one day for a long ride on the range Susan called his attention to the depre-dations of their neighbor's bull. He laughed and told her to shoot him if he broke into her garden any more. Upon his return a fortnight later he found the bull's hide hanging on the fence. Susan had taken her husband at the young couple had made a stake and for the children's sake moved

The Hero of the Farm

There is many a woman on the farm, working hard from morning till night, enjoying no luxuries, seeing nothing of note, hearing less; denied by a stingy husband even the necessities of life; deprived of books, church, theatre, social enjoyment and everything else for which her nature yearns. And yet she goes uncomplainingly on, milking the cows, hoeing the garden, feeding the chickens, bearing the children, cooking and mending, all work and no play. God help the poor womanly hero of some farms!

In the Home Mission Field

In a little coast village dwelt a refined, cultured, highly educated minister and his wife. On the walls of their little cottage home were hung diplomas from the best colleges and theological seminaries of our land. Used to the highest and best of college and social life, this young couple had decided to do missionary work in their native land. After many days of careful consideration of all that it would cost them, the refined home, the college, the seminary and the East with all its attractions and pleasures were left behind and their faces turned toward the little coast village where the writer saw them. And there, dear reader, with a happy, godly smile upon their countenances, the young people,—miles from a railroad, shut in from the world for months at a time, on a remote part of the Pacific coast,—this godly pair were constantly sacrificing their own pleasure and comfort for the happiness of others. For years these young people sacrificed and toiled, sharing others' burdens, bringing to others all the joy and giving all the happiness they could. There, amid squalor, skepticism, ignorance and suspicion, they toiled and wavered not. Toiled not for the money; not for the personal gain; not for the eulogy of men, but for the cause of Christ, who had bought them with a price. From the standpoint of the world they were fools, but judged by the standard of Him who does all things well, they are registered as the real heroes of the day.

Educate for Law Enforcement

But times are changing. Men are being educated to the idea of law enforcement; the old idea of things is passing away; the almost universal indifference to law enforcement is being done away with, and the leaders in the struggle for common decency and those who bear the country's burdens will in due time be counted, as indeed they must, as among the real heroes of our land.

Do Your Part

Now, dear folks, you of course can't be all counted as real heroes, but you can do your part toward making better men and women, better homes and better towns and government. You can read and watch and pray and vote and work for better things, and you will enjoy a real satisfaction in doing your part as one of the real heroes to do right in the face of the opposition of the majority. Make the year 1908 a heroic year for right and for you.

The Coward

is the fellow that works in the dark; he is afraid of the law and every honest man. He knows he is doing wrong and is afraid the honest man will catch him at it. Hence every chance he gets he bemoans the honest man, because he knows if a man is honest—honest to himself, to his town, county, state and nation,—he is against him, the coward, the lawbreaker and criminal.
