A VETERAN GRANGER GONE.

Death of J. J. Woodman, Once Master of the National Grange.

One of the staunch members of the Order of Patrons of Husbandry and a former national grange master has passed away. Hon. J. J. Woodman of Pawpaw, Mich., died last July, mourned by a host of people. Mr. Woodman united with the grange in its early days. He became a member of the fourth grange organized in the state of Michigan. He was elected master of the Pawpaw grange in 1874 and in June, 1875, became master of the national grange, which office he held for several years. The same year he was elected overseer of the national grange, which office he held until 1879, at which time he was chosen master of the national grange. He held this position until 1885, when he was elected a member of the executive committee and made its secretary. He also held several positions of honor in public life, the most notable of which was his service as member of the Michigan house of representatives for a period of twelve years, 1861-73. He was speaker pro tem. in 1867 and speaker in 1867-71.

When he was elected master of Michigan state grange about 600 granges had been organized in that state and many had joined the Order for the financial benefit which they hoped to get from it. The greenback question was also in discussion at that time, and the granges were disrupted in some instances by the fierce discussion on the money question. Mr. Woodman went to work to reconstruct things, to enforce obedience to the ritual and give dignity to the degree work. His very grand services when grand services were most needed. He possessed many qualities of a true leader. He was an influential and forcible speaker, and his breadth of mind caused him to view all phases of the grange work in their true relation. He was familiar with the early history of the Order and knew well the early workers. The idea of restoring harmony and strength between the north and south just after the war was one real cause that brought about the organization of the Order of Patrons of Husbandry. Mr. Woodman relates how, when Mr. Wardlaw, master of Florida state grange, addressed the national grange at one session, he declared that he was ready then and there to grasp the hand of a brother from Vermont or any other northern state and in behalf of every member of the Order from the south pledge and bury all bitterness and ill feeling and work in fraternal unity. Immediately E. B. Colton, then master of Vermont state grange, rushed to the floor and grasped Mr. Wardlaw by the hand with the Patron's grip and said in behalf of every member of the northern states: "We reciprocate your pledge and assure you that your desire of fraternal unity and brotherly love is as sincere in northern hearts as it can be in the hearts of southern brothers and sisters. We pledge you that we will use our influence through this fraternal Order to bury ill feeling and bitterness between the north and south." At the conclusion of his remarks a recess was declared, and each and all gave pledges of fealty to the sentiment.
