During political campaigns one realizes what a number of speakers have an infinite gift of using a great amount of language to say nothing.

A man's character is always enriched by having a supreme purpose in life, provided, of course, that the purpose itself is right.

A noted architect recently said that the time will come when Chicago and other cities will be beautiful in the extreme by virtue of what will be accomplished through the highly trained esthetic taste and the application of true scientific methods. No dirty streets no dust, no smoke, no foul sights or smells, no slums, nothing but beauty, order and prosperity. That, indeed, is a vision that everyone hopes may be realized in every place. But while waiting for it to materialize it would be just as well for everyone to keep his own premises clean. By so doing he will make present conditions better and will help forward the municipal millennium.

Keep Your Plant Food

A farmer who sells a ton of clover hay instead of feeding it to his own cows loses.

Proof: A ton of clover hay worth about $10 takes away $9.04 worth of fertility from the soil. When a farmer sells a ton of butter—worth about $600—he only loses 50c worth of fertility from his soil.

These figures are from experts in the Kansas State Agricultural College and are based on the cost of commercial fertilizers. That is, it takes $9.04 worth of commercial fertilizer to replace the plant food taken out of the soil by a ton of clover hay, while it takes only 50c worth of fertilizer to replace that taken from the soil when a ton of butter is produced.

See the point? Its an argument in favor of dairying.

It is not the dairy farmer that will wake up some morning and find his farm depleted, for in the manure which he returns to the soil he replaces the food spent in making dairy products.

Many of the best farms are being ruined by continuous cropping. No system of farming excels dairying in respect to its preservation of soil fertility.

If the dairy farm is judiciously managed it will increase in fertility from year to year. In Holland, Denmark, and the Channel Islands, where the dairy industry has been carried on for 500 to 2,000 years, the soil is gradually increasing in fertility. The wheat yield in Denmark today is double that of 30 years ago.—Industrialist.
