Tragedy and Romance In Homecoming of Soldier.

By LEWIS JAMES.

The hand of old Papa Tzantili trembled. The day's doings had been all wrong, and in his capacity as village priest at Mitriane he had been unable to help himself.

And then the news had come. It and later, when men's excitement rection of the village. could no longer be restrained, in joyout shouts.

"Marino is coming! Our Marino! Karistinaki, the Cretan eagle! Our hero! The slayer of Bulgaria! The savior of the oppressed! He is coming home.

Papa Tzantili went into his house on the outskirts of the village. He wished to avoid being questioned. He sat in his little room upstairs and gazed sadly toward the quay.

Toward evening a steamboat churned her way between the northern promontory of the island and the barren rock which rose sentinel a quarter of a mile off.

In the stem of the vessel stood a huge man with his hands upon the converging bulwark. He was a Cretan born, to judge by his dress, which he had donned for the special occasion of his homecoming.

He looked before him fixedly, and joy-flerce and glorious joy-filled his eyes.

As the boat began to pass under the promontory, a little calque shot round a projecting rock, followed by another and another. And as they came within halling distance, their crews began to shout. At first it seemed to the Cretan that these were but the usual overtures of a varkari soliciting passengers from the anchorage to the quay. But with a sudden hot flush of pleasure he soon realized the truth. Some one had told the news of his coming. They were shouting his name in welcome

But Marino had other plans in view. He was well aware that once among this exuberant throng on shore it might be hours before he could tear himself away, and the first joys of his home-coming must be unobserved.

So, not loath to enjoy the triumph, but wishing to postpone it, he prevalled upon the skipper to land him in a secluded cove 20 minutes or more before the vessel should reach its appointed haven that he might first visit the home of his fiance.

Marino stepped ashore and gazed about him at the familiar scene.

He scrambled up the rocks a little way so that the view might be extended. Then he caught the sound of volces overhead, and presently he saw give in. Marino, mine, if you had the figure of a small boy emerge from a shallow cleft, and, with a frightened glance behind him, run up the zigzag path beyond.

In another second the Cretan discovered what the boy had been doing. A skin of wine lay at the entrance to the cleft, and as he advanced silently he Mitriane." could make out the form of a man ing some food the boy had brought.

"I will go to Marianthe," he said, and strode forth.

His gray beard told Marina that this was the father of Marianthe.

"They are fleet of foot tonight," thought he, and came to the door. It was open, and the dim light just sufficed to show him the one room of which the place consisted.

There was an armchair by the open window, and in it a woman rocked to and fro in an agony of grief.

Marino stood silent for several moments. Then he went in and took the woman in his arms.

"Marianthe, my loved one, I have come back to you!"

For a moment her arms were about his neck, and she raised her eyes to his and looked at him sorrowfully.

"Do you not say anything to me?" "Why did you not come sooner?"

in a whisper so low as scarcely to be heard.

"I have come as soon as it was possible. Why do you look so at me?" He broke off and seized her hands, and covered them with kisses.

"Adoni said that the story came that I had been killed." "Yes. They brought the cap I made for you, all stained with blood and torn by a bullet."

"I lost the cap six months ago. But they brought it-who?"

For the first time the shadow of suspicion 'crossed his mind. He was stroking her hands still, waiting for her to speak. "Ay-and then?" The words hissed away her hands from him.

"And then-and then," she cried, 'he came to my old father. For a ong time nothing was said to me, but I know now that it was arranged beween them that I should marry D'metri. Ah, do not look at me so! Oh, Marino, my loved one, there was no life for me when you were dead. There was nothing. But I loathed D'metri. I tried to flee away from the island, but they brought me back. And at length-at length I was forced to come but yesterday!"

For a whole minute they stared at each other.

"You are frightened, D'Metri?" Marino asked shortly, grinning in contempt and amusement. "You didn't expect to see me here so soon. You thought I was still with the bands. Is it not so, D'metri?"

He saw D'metri's hand slide into his pocket, and the next instant his own flashed over his head. One short scream strangled in the coward's throat, and Marino's knife struck home again.

For a moment or two the soldier stood over him, his face glowering, then without a backward glance continued the ascent.

Righteous indignation lent additional vigor to Marino's stride, and in a few minutes he had mounted the zigzag path and stood upon the rock road which led to the cottage. As he came nearer he saw the small boy who had brought food for D'metri sit ting at the roadside, cutting up an onion with a big knife. As the Cretan approached the lad started up in terror and began to run.

"Stop!" cried Marino. "Come here; I will not hurt you, little one."

The big man's voice was kind, and the boy obeyed. For a while they looked at each other, in the gathering Then, with a shout, Marino dusk. laid his hands upon the boy's shoulders.
