He was fixing a tug when the colt landed on him and lifted him clear over the harrow. Striking on this implement with his face was what caused the injury. Joe was "knocked out" for a few minutes.

Exemption of Farm Hands

Farmers who have skilled farm hands of draft age can get deferred classification for a time, provided such men are indispensable to the maximum production on the farm.

The United States Employment Service announces that in the new draft for 90,000 men shortly to be called, farmers with experienced help should file with the local draft board an affidavit supported by two witnesses who will say under oath that they are acquainted with the farm hand whose services are asked to be retained and that he is experienced and indispensable to the maximum production of the farm on which he is employed. "Do this at once before a notary public and file with the local draft board," says M. S. Shrock, county agricultural agent, who also says:

"This is not intended to help slackers or near slackers to avoid for a time the draft. It is for the sole purpose of increasing production. Farm hands of draft age should be made to understand this. As soon as they are not so employed, the exemption is removed."
