COX AND ROOSEVELT.

The nomination of Cox and Roosevelt gives the democratic party a strong ticket and a good fighting chance for victory in November.

That Cox is the strongest man who could have been chosen to head the ticket is a matter of individual opinion. At all events he was the choice of an untrammelled convention after many weary hours of balloting. Inevitably there were party bosses at San Francisco as at Chicago. But they could only boss certain delegations—not the convention. The White House "dictator" did no dictating, although he now asserts his entire approval of the nominee.

The assertion that Cox is a "wet" candidate falls flat, in view of his opposition to a wet plank in the platform. He is the joint nominee of both the wet and dry forces at the convention. This had to be true of any candidate, since either faction could have kept the convention deadlocked forever.

Three times elected governor of the great state of Ohio, Cox has a splendid record of achievement and of law enforcement. As president of the United States he will respect and enforce the federal prohibition laws. This country will continue "bone dry" despite the groundless fears of William Jennings Bryan.

As to the activities of Tammany—which accepted Cox but did not nominate him and to whom he owes nothing—if Tammany, we say, is the fly in the democratic ointment, then is the entire republican ointment in the Old Guard fly. Of these evils, choose ye the least.

The outstanding fact is that the League of Nations becomes the great issue between the rival parties, and practically the only issue of consequence. Between the candidates, even, there is little to choose. As a matter of fact, neither party need be ashamed of the head of its ticket. Cox and Harding are types of successful, active and sturdy Americans—men who have achieved prominence both in private and public life and are respected and honored by their fellow citizens. Practical men of affairs, if not idealists neither are they corrupt, selfish nor unprogressive—could not be, in fact, and reach the place that is theirs. The two men are so very much alike, in fact, that the choice will lie between the principles they advocate.

If you feel that the United States is committed to the League of Nations and should unite with other great powers in fostering the wonderful ideal that has sprung from the war-scourged bosom of Europe, you will vote for James M. Cox in November. If you feel that the United States should "paddle its own canoe" while classing itself with "Revolutionary Mexico, Bolshevik Russia and Unspeakable Turkey," you will cast your ballot for Warren G. Harding.

Just about the best little predictor in the grain business is Editor Pickel of Rosenbaum Review, not a few of whose five-dollar-a-year subscribers regard him as an oracle. He makes a close study of the grain situation, and hits the market nail on the head with surprising consistency and precision. Just about now around here unusual interest attaches to Pickel's views, as with a bumper crop in prospect a bumper price will mean royal returns to the East End farmer. The Chicago prophet finds the price outlook encouraging. He predicts in his chart a gradual drop during the fall months to around $2.25 or $2.30 a bushel, but a corresponding rise next spring to an entirely new and unprecedented figure, which he characterizes with a question mark. Pickel is not only a market seer, but as long ago as last January he foretold Harding's nomination. He has been right so often about wheat that what he prints is given respectful consideration by a number of leading East End farmers. Should wheat this fall follow the downward course he has indicated, these men will be quite likely to hold for the spring market.

We have never had an editor as president of the United States, says the Oregonian. Nineteen of our presidents were lawyers when elected, three were statesmen, two were soldiers, one was a planter, one a farmer and one a public official. None of them had ever been an editor and none was the son of an editor. Two of our presidents have become editors, or editorial writers, after leaving office. Turn about is fair play; all things come to him
