

The Golden Harvest is On

Huckleberries are ripe—and peace to the campers, for the jail-breaking murderers are now wearing Oregon Boots.

If justice be done, we'll have something to go to this Fall other than the Round Up.

Gee! This is a great world! We observe that every Harvest we have endured we have lived the whole year through.

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

Every now and then the esteemed Saturday Evening Post permits itself an expression of annoyance, not to say peevishness, because the great American people were misled and thwarted and bamboozled and betrayed at both Chicago and San Francisco.

Perchance it is even so, but nothing can be done about it and nothing could have been done about it—for the reason that the people never know what they want, while the politicians almost invariably do.

You and I—to mention the more important first—and Tom, Dick and Harry constitute the American people. We have conflicting interests and conflicting desires and conflicting political views. We are always hopelessly divided as to men and issues. The most of us are grouped in two great opposing political camps, always suspicious of each other and always determined to defeat each other, and these camps have a number of factional sub-divisions. We can never get together as an entire people, and our supposed political wishes are crystallized in party action. To act at all we must be led, and it therefore follows that we are never wiser than our political leaders. Sometimes they are wise, but never are they disinterested.

Herbert Hoover, who perhaps more nearly than any other man in the public eye typified a people's candidate, might conceivably have had the democratic nomination—not because the democratic leaders wanted Hoover, but because they would have been forced to regard him as the most available man with whom to overcome the omnipresent republican majority. But Hoover did not want the democratic nomination and he could not get the republican nomination. The republican leaders did not have to deal with a democratic majority, and felt themselves independent of Hoover, who had never worn their party collar nor taken part in their party councils.

And so we are left with Cox, who is tagged as a Tammany candidate, and Harding, who is tagged as an Old Guard candidate. But while the Old Guard was active and successful at Chicago, and Tammany was active and successful at San Francisco, a comprehensive reading of convention reports would seem to indicate that their success was the result of accident rather than design. Space does not permit us to enter into this phase of the question, but it is quite apparent that had the political cards fallen just a little differently Wood or Lowden would have been the nominee at Chicago and Davis—after the collapse of the McAdoo boom—the nominee at San Francisco. Wood was not an Old Guard darling, nor was Davis a pet of Tammany.

And so, as we have said, it is Cox or Harding. One or the other will have to be president unless we want Debs or Christenson or the prohibition nominee. They are good Americans with good public and private records. Practical politicians they may perchance be, but perchance it may also be that the American people want a practical politician in the White House. Roosevelt had to die before he was accorded the full laurels of public approval for a record of uncompromisingly progressive statesmanship. And not until after Woodrow Wilson's death will his worth be recognized by his countrymen.

As for us, with either Cox or Harding in the White House we will not feel alarmed over the country's future. We prefer Cox for the reason that his election would be equivalent to endorsement by the United States of the League of Nations—the most altruistic and promising world movement of all time.

The graceful tree swallows, first of our local birds to migrate, have already disappeared from their favorite haunts and proceeded to their winter home in the southland. So soon as the fledglings are sufficiently strong of wing to undertake the journey, the departure is made. Why the leave-taking is fixed so early in the season, when insect food is still abundant, is a problem which bird lovers have not solved to their satisfaction.

No rose is without its thorn. If we didn't have the well known "Initiative and Referendum" here in Oregon, we wouldn't have a single tax bill bobbing up at every state election.

When "ould Ireland" is finally free, we will never know whether the government or the governed is entitled to the greater sympathy.
