The Wreath of Lilies.

"These are pond lilies, Celestine," said Harry Seymour to his heart's idol, a beautiful girl of seventeen borhood had congregated to the summers, whose rustic seat was a moss-clad rock near a tiny brooklet, the pure blue waters of which kissed the margin upon the pebbly and verdant shore.

Celestine Weston held in her hand a fishing-pole, impatiently waiting for a single bite from some hungry little sunny-side, should one perchance come that way. It was while thus engaged that she had seen spotless flowers in a marshy part of the brook.

"Here they are, darling, a whole hatful."

"How beautiful; my favorite flowers !" "And they are mine, also," responded Harry. 'What shall we do with them? Would that they would uever fade, so that we might keep them as mementos of the past !" 'And I-however, we will twine for each other a wreath. You are aware that there is a way to preserve flowers so that they will retain their natural beanty. I will procure the chemicals, and the wreath you twine is mine-mine yours.

'Bravo, Harry ! That is the very thing !

'Wait, little one, until I have finished.

'Go on then,' said Celestine, all attention.

'You remember that I sail for Europe by the first steamer leaving for weeks in a state of high delirium port. We will keep our wreath of caused from a severe contusion on lilies as a pure and spotless emblem the head. As soon as convalescent of our undving love toward each he embarked on the first ship sailing other; and if I should die while ab- f or home, just in time to save h s besent, darling, it will be my heart's loved from a fate worse than death, earnest wish that your wreath of lilies be placed upon my bosom.' 'O, Harry, don't talk so,' sobbed Celestine.

A few months later, in the lovely month of May, the fisherman's hut was lighted up, and there was music and dancing within. The happy youths and maidens of the neighmerry-making, for Celestine and the Captain were to be married. The hour arrived, and Celestine arrayed in white gauze, with her vail sweeping the floor, walked out on the homespun carpet, to be made the bride of the man to whose arm she clung. No sculptor's work was whiter than Celestine's lifeless looking form; no ice colder than her hands; no pang greater than the one that fettered her aching heart.

The usual questions were put to the bridegroom, and then fell the respunsive monosyllable, "Yes." The minister then turned to the bride and repeated his words, but Celestine did not answer. She appeared in an absent, listless mood and apparently insensible to all around. The words were repeated but no answer came. And then, out in the dusky gloom of night, called a loud familiar voice *Celestine, Celestine ! where is my darling? bring forth the wreath of illies!

The man rushed into the lighted apartment, and Celestine's trembling form was clasped in the outstretched arms of Harry Seymour. 'Save me, Harry, save me.' 'Yes, darling, I will save you, re-olied Harry. An explanation was soon given.

He had been wrecked, and taken to the morgue in Paris; he revived and lay a marriage without love. Harry Seymour drew from his bosom the wreath of pond-lilies and placed it upon Celestine's brow.
