How Sleep the Brave?

As the bitter chalice of defeat wil soon be visited to the lips of at least 39 aspiring candidates for the Senate, be ours the task to soothe their exasperated spirits at the ingratitude of Republics, to raise their bruised heads them to a seat in a higher tabernacle than the United States Senate, where board is free, and whisky can be manufactured by the barrel at the word of command of the Governor of that better land. Look up and be cheerful; what matters it to after time if pang and sorrow contorts and agonizes the frames of 39. "Tis but a passing spasm, and will soon be over. Nature will not be wrecked along with your aspiratime shall be no more.

From down the vista of years a fragment of quotation comes to us, we know not from whence, but it fills the soul with solace as its memory floats in on us: "The whangdoodle mourneth for its first-born." Take this to your hearts! sorrowful 39; apply its balm to the wounds of your own defeat. You all instinctively know that the poor old mother whangdoodle of Democracy will added to the holocaust of the shelved; from the tears of this sorrowing mother will spring the benediction of your vanished dreams; tears, which, while they consign you to oblivion, bedew your political graves and keep them verdant to associate with memories of you in the long hereafter.

Brother Scott, please pass the hat.
