just about dusk. Brown is inclined to lay the most of the blame of the whole matter on Johnson, and states that the latter put up the job and led him into it. He says they went up to Oregon City a few days before the robbery, intending to burglarize the postoffice there-Johnson being acquainted there. They were, however, so closely watched by the police that they gave that job up and returned to Portland. He says, moreover, that Johnson 'spotted' O'Shea's place and talked him into the robbery—he at first refusing to participate in the robbery.
