Zulu Warfare.

The Marshal Ney Romance.

The rumor that the native moops serving with the British troops in South Africa, have massacred their officers and deserted, gives voice to the fears of the English officers who have seen service in Cape Colony. Lieut. Edgecome, an officer in South Africa, and recently arrived in New York, does not hesitate to pronounce the Fingo allies of the British unreliable, cowardly and treacherous. In the previous wars it was their custom, as soon as a battle opened, to retire behind their European supports and fire in the direction of the enemy without regard to their friends in front. This always made them dangerous friends. and caused the regulars to look on them with distrust. It was claimed that they shot more of their own officers in an engagement than did the enemy, and that in many cases the officers of a native regiment were the only ones to remain on the ground.

If this story is true, it is easy to be lieve the rumors as to desertion and massacre. The Kaffirs in Cape Colony and Natal ought to be the enemies of the Zulus, as the latter have driven many of the former from their old homes. But if the natives, avowedly friendly to the English, are so inefficient and untrustworthy as soldiers, there is the greater need of veteran English regiments for service against an enemy that has proved formidable.

The population of Cape Colony in 1875 was about 1,000,000, and less than one third were Europeans. From this white populatihn ought to come a good volunteer army, and several efficient local organizations are in the field. The Dutch Boers, it is reported, have not distinguished themselves in recent campaigns, but in defensive warfare they would probably do better.

Against the regulars and European volunteers, Cetywayo, the Zulu king, will throw all of his available troops, and may influence Secoconi, Keeli, and other independent chiefs on the border to join him in war against the British.

The Zulus are of a higher type than the negro, and are described by Englishtravelers as brown of complexion, with woolly hair; tall, graceful, strong and ac tive. They came from the North at the beginning of the century, and their courage and better organization enabled them to drive off or make slaves of the contact. They now occupy the territory north of Natai, and hold in partial subjection some of the neighboring tribes, They have long been noted for their courage and daving, and Cetywayo has for fifteen years had a reputation as an organizer and soldier. His power is absolute, and the peculiar character and customs of his people have made it possible for him to impress upon them the characteristics of his own vigorous individuality. Under Zulu law no man can marry under forty years of age unless by the King's permission. All has prepared a very able discourse, which will soon appear in pamphlet form, and deserves to be generally read and considered. He traces the law of the Sabbath, the seventh day of rest, under the early Hebrew disponsation; its need to weary man as a day of rest from care and labor, and its dedication to the worship of God. He proceeds to show the interpretation given to the Sabbath by the Savior, that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath; that Christ delegated all power to His disciples and they dedicated the first day of the week to H m, calling it the Lord's Day, observing it upon the day of the week when He was restored to them. He shows in an interesting series of sketches from Roman history, the writings of Pliny and Trajan, what persecution Christians endured for its ob servance and how the Christian Church with unanimity commemorated the first day of the week, under the example set by the Apostles.
