Better leave its walls plain and bare, its floor uncarpeted and its furniture of the simplest kind, for the educating power of severity is far more profitable than that of meritricious ornament. But the nursery should be kept clean, wholesome and sweet, its air pure, and the little ones who live in it should be taught to be as orderly in their room and play as they are elsewhere in the house. A child can play leapfrog with grace as well as dance well if he is only taught to do so; and there is no good sense in permitting lawlessness in a child simply because he is in the nursery, and so can do no harm. The greatest harm that can come from reckless, careless ways, is that done to bed chamber of Princess Amelia, and the child's intellect, morals or manners, which are as easily contaminated in the nursery as in the parlor .- Chris-
