FREEMASONRY.

The Universal Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

Address of Hon. T. A. McBride at the Annual Masonic Session, Held at St. Helens, June 19, 1890.

WORKING MEN, LADIES, GENTLEMEN, AND BROTHERS:

Science with telescopic vision has penetrated the heavens and wrested from the circling sun of a boundless universe their mighty secrets. It has penetrated the teeming bosom of our mother earth, and from her inmost recesses has brought forth "Those things which were hid from the foundation of the world." It has grasped the very lightning and tamed it, and rendered it the efficient servant of man. It has weighed the planets, and thrown the sun into its balances. All the secrets of sky, earth and sea are at its command and have yielded themselves to its uses. But with all this research—with all this power—with all the aggregated and acquired wisdom of the ages, there is one secret that it has been unable to obtain from the obscure records of the past, or to read in the virgin pages of the future. That secret is THE MIGHTY PROBLEM OF MAN'S ORIGIN, AND HIS ULTIMATE DESTINY.

The sage and the savage, the philosopher and the peasant, the mighty intellect that could summon at will such creatures of the imagination as Hamlet or Faust, and the rude unlettered Equinarian whose whole stock of knowledge reached scarcely beyond what is necessary to supply the sordid necessities of a precarious existence, are alike, baffled by the inquiries, Whence came man? Where goes man? Is he some minor in the moral universe, a being left stranded like some shipwrecked mariner on this bleak island in the universal sea of ether until a brighter dawn, a clearer sky, and a "Fisur and steatite" shall lead the ethereal way that leads to the asphodel meadows of a joyous and unending existence? Or, rather, is he a child of the soil, lowly, kindred of the flower, the serpent, the insect, the bird and the brute, struggling upward and heavenward through countless ages of the past, and yet to struggle through countless ages of the future, until he shall, through the devious questing of his intellect, and the hidden possibilities, attain that grander destiny and nobler life dreamed of by the philosopher, pictured by the prophet and sung by the poet, when, with all earth's secrets stored in the treasure-house of his developed intellect, and all earth's material life vanished by that natural selection that is constantly raising each generation of men above the level of the man whose race he has inherited? Has that which constituted the most of what is valuable and attractive in man been blotted forever from existence?—disappeared in everlasting oblivion? Or, has he merely assumed a new form, taken another step in the grand process of development, which is the law of the universe? To the solution of this problem the best thought of the world has been given in all the ages. With that mighty yearning for something better than this earthly life which has characterized all ages and conditions of men everywhere, man has sought to follow every clue that might, perchance, lead to a knowledge of an immortal existence, and, as citizens of the same country, finding themselves on an alien shore and in a foreign land, mutually associate themselves in brotherly sympathy and comfort, so the children of men, contemplating the great problem
