if there is a tide in the affairs of men no there is also in the career of cities; and in the histories of both there are rolden opportunities that only need to be mnroved to lead on to fortune. Portland has grown slowly and surely rich. Her merchants came there poor, scarce one of them having business capital, and the greatest and proudest of her captalists to-day, were blessed with more energy than wealth when they tied their fortunes to the town, bus planting themselves where they could catch the stream of trade, they sat down and lo it pour their laps full of treasure, and the consequence is that they live in complacent ease to-day upon the wealth which has flowed in upon them.

Heretofore there has been but one tide in the affairs of that city, which has grown richer than the State, because it has successfully levied a tax upon both the imports and exports of Oregon and kept the State in vassalage to the town. If we were to say that her citizens have displayed remarkable enterprise, we would level a prodigious sarcasm at her honest burghers, whose highest aim and most successful endeavors have been to restrain the commerce of our State within such bounds, that the city will remain in full control. Every effort to maintain direct trade with the East, which is possible and proper, Portland has thwarted; any attempt to encourage cheap fares and freights she has discouraged; and when railroad communication with California was talked of, they denounced it as a ridiculous and suicidal idea.

It really seemed as if the men who ranked as prominent and influential capitalists there, were afraid the State would develop faster than they could control it, and dreaded, above all things, the commencement of any enterprise which was beyond their reach and control. Perhaps they were not to blame with being satisfied with a heavy commission on everyshing the country had for sale, or could afford to buy. They had a sure thing, and were modest enough not to want more, for theirs has always been the lion's share. But the people naturally long for some change or growth that shall favor them, they will favor all enterprises which can develop Oregon, and they hail the coming of capital in any form, which can wield a thousand picks and level our

The "business managers" of Portland have corraled an enterprise, and have got it on their hands. They strangled the East side road for a while, determined it should enrich them, or Oregon should wait for its accomplishment. They may now be squeezing the "West Side" enterprise, determined to force out a golden •gg or kill it, and if that is their plan they had better stand aside and let the road pass into other and legitimate hands, that stand ready to build railroads upon the guaranty that one new can afford. It is certain that the investment of an amount within the easy reach of Portland capital, can insure the speedy construction of the West Side road. Let them furnish the money, then, or give up the project to those both able and willing.' The tide is flowing which leads on to fortune, and if Portland will ride upon it, to be greater, and disarm opposition and rivalry, let her rich men develop the liberal enterprise ecessary to insure permanent greatness. It is not impossible to divert a great part of the trade of this country to some ther channel. Great influences will be brought to bear in favor of Paget Sound as a grand commercial point. A railroad is to be built to Astoria. Portland don't believe it, and considers the project a pretty joke, which will die out if let alone, at the road will be built ; the road to the Sound will be built ; the roads to the Humboldt and to Sacramento will be built; the Northern Pacific road 18 already building, and the question with Portland to-day, is not how to speculate apon great enterprises, and on the State at large, but to use her gains, which are enormous, to aid and direct this development, and make every enterprise redound to her own future greatness. Else they may, before long, be singing that not very classic song, "Root Hog, or Die."
