'Tisthe Isle of Song I From its temples, grand sweet voices come in the night'sstill hours, And I know—for aye with minstrel band Seraphim walk in the star-lit bowers — I know they are there with their radiant brows, Whose hearts' deep breathings of hope and trust Have lightened the weight of the harsh world's blows, And lifted my spirit from gloom and dust.

Oh, ebb and flow of the surging tide 1 Oh, clouds that are black with the coming

Oh, breath of the billows wild and wide ! Are ye bearing thither my shrinking form? The kind winds wait me many a strain From its blossoming valleys fresh and fair; But, above them, I hear the clank of the chain

That bindeth my soul to the world of care !

Oh, beautiful isle !--sweet island afar ! Oh, murmuring fountans of rostest wine ! Oh, eyes, shining out as a luminous star On my frail bark shut from the light di-vine!

I can hear, I can hear, as the night grows A sound as of song from the passionless pines But phantoms of gloom from the echoes creep, And dangerous darkness vex the winds.

Ah, few are the spirits whose own true home is the calm, pure isle where the soit skies

And song will hallow each floating breath.

To that blossoming isle my bark glides on Forever away c'er the stormful sea; Ouward through darkness that knows no dawn.

dawn, dawn, To the hurbor fair as the fair may be. And off, when the billows are wild and high, And the car is broken under my hand, My sad eyes catch a glimpse of sky That leaneth low to the Infanis Land !

were So little I resk of the broken oar— The strained oar—broken under my hand ; Enough that I'm nearing the beautiful shore, The biossoming shore of the Infinite Land!
