GERMAN-AMERICANS.

Industrious and Frugal People Who Have Done Much for the West. The German settler is not over par ticular about the quality of his land, so long as his title to it is clear. If he can find a good tract of prairie land, at a fair price, he buys it; if not, he goes into the woods, "grubs out" a farm, acre by acre, and in the course of years ecures a property which compares well with that of his prairie neighbor. It really does not seem to matter much with him whether the soil is good, poor or indifferent. If it is in the slightest degree workable, he will make it pay, and pay well. There is something almost mysterious in his success. It would be called mysterious, were it not so common. But this phenomenon has been witnessed again and again in Wisconsin. Some portions of the State might never have been settled at all, had not the German immigrant found his way to them, and built his humble home, and broken the unpromising soil. But there he is, prosperous and contented, and his children are growing up around him. In some places he has caused the desert to blossom as the rose, and he does not seem to be free rose, and he does not seem to be grudge the years of bard toil that he has spent in this effort. He is not afraid of work. His fathers always worked hard. Why should not he?

The German is not given to launching out for himself, alone and single-handed, in new and untried enterprises. He is conservative in disposition. Furthermore, his social instincts are Furthermore, his social instincts are stronger than those of the American, and he will not isolate himself. Even if by living far apart from his countrymen he could own richer land and more of it, he would generally prefer to remain in the community which he and his neighbors have formed, enjoying its advantages. have formed, enjoying its advantages and sharing its mishaps. With him society means a great deal. Had he not been assured of the society of his compatri ts in the New World, no visions of broad acres would ever have tempted him to leave the fatherland. He builds up communities here which are as distinctively Teutonic as any villages of Saxony or Wurtemberg. There are certain streets in Milwaukee the German-American metropolis, on which one may easily imagine himself in the Prussian capital. There are towns in the interior of Wisconsin in which the predominating spoken lan-guage in the stores and shops is Ger-man. Because of this tendency to gather in communities, some people say that the German is clannish. yet this accusation is hardly just. lo not make enough allowance for differences of temperament and tastes between him and us. He does not adapt himself easily to his surround? ings. Amalgamation is a difficult problem with him, but in his slow, deliberate way he is working out a solution. Despite his tenacious social notions-and can we deny that they do tions—and can we deny that they do him honor?—he is gradually letting down the bars of nationality, and adapting himself to the conditions which he finds in the land of his adoption. Take him as he is to day, on his Wiscor, in farm, and no one need despair of his future. He has the making of the substantial American citizen, and we can not doubt that time will
