

WALLOWA CHIEFTAIN

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY
Chieftain Publishing Company,
JOSEPH, OREGON.

PRIDE.

Could one ascend with an unheard of flight,
An skyward, skyward without limit soar,
As if the pinion of a god he wore,
Till earth were left a dwindling star, whose light
Flew faint upon his track; at last his height
All height would vanish; there in deeps of space
Were neither upper nor inferior place:
Distinction's little zone below him quite.
Oh, happy dreams of such a soul have I,
And softly to my heart of him I sing,
Who seraph pride all pride doth overwing;
Soars unto meekness, reaches low by high,
And, as in grand equalities of the sky,
Stands level with the beggar and the king.
—David Atwood Wasson.

Emperor William at Waterloo.

The Emperor William, of Germany, commanded a regiment at the battle of Waterloo, and Gen. Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania, had nearly reached man's state when that battle was fought. And when we read of the first Napoleon and his deeds we think of it all as belonging to some far distant period—indeed, it reads almost like a fable. How many latitudes, by the way, on the whole face of this earth, are now alive who were living when the Emperor William and Gen. Cameron were born? Can there be more than 1,000—or perhaps 2,000?—Philadelphia Times.

How Electricity Kills.

An expert electrician seriously advances the proposition that will provoke discussion, asserts that it is not the electricity of the human system receives that kills, but that it is destroyed, wrenched from the subjugation of a superabundance of the fluid, by a discharge. In other words, if a man gets converted into an electrical jar, he would prove an entirely trustworthy reservoir of electricity. Any quantity of the fluid might be "banked" in him. But the moment it is drawn from him he drops lifeless, limp as the sparrow that falls from the wire.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Calling the Waitress.

In the stylish up town houses in New York now it is impossible to see how the lady of the house communicates with the kitchen while a meal is in progress. This is because the call bell has become a mere electric button on one of the table legs, and she presses it with her foot whenever she wants the waitress. For a very few dollars—about twenty-five—New York houses are now fitted with electric systems, including the front door bell and bells in the bedrooms.—Good Housekeeping.

The Southern Climate.

It seems to me that the old theory which makes the southern climate enervating is a false one. So far as I am concerned it certainly is false. I find an exhilaration in this latitude which to me is a temptation to overwork rather than to the contrary. Sooner or later all this Gulf coast will be to the United States what the Mediterranean coast is to France and Italy—a great winter resort, not only for invalids but for all who prefer warm weather and soft air.—Maurice Thompson.

Wearing Feathers in Brazil.

Although Brazil is noted for its birds of brilliant plumage, it is said that the empress does not countenance the wearing of their feathers and will not allow them to be used on any part of her dresses. She is reported to have told a lady at Cannes that, "much as she admires the feathers of the magnificent birds of Brazil, she only likes them on their bodies."—New York Evening World.

Irrigation in California.

The irrigation of land in California not only benefits the area to which the water is directly applied, but tracts fifteen or twenty miles away. The water thus conducted through the plains can go no lower than the hardpan, which is always near the surface—from three to twenty feet—and thus the whole country is deriving a benefit by its spreading.—Chicago Times.

A Paying Profession.

One of the paying professions of Paris is said to be that of trunk packer. In many of the little trunk shops you can hire for forty cents an hour a man who will pack your trunks artistically, folding expensive gowns and other garments in tissue paper, and stowing away delicate bric-a-brac in the safest way.—New York Sun.

Nothing to Wear.

Wife—I declare I am almost ashamed to go to church with this hat on. It isn't at all the style.
Husband—Is this Bridget's Sunday outfit?
Wife—No.
Husband—Why don't you borrow hers?—Harper's Bazar.

Notice of a Funeral.

The most noteworthy feature of the sad occasion was an eloquent address by Jim Peg-top, a brother-in-law of the remains. Jim is a hustler from way back, and has done much to corral the big boom which this town is now having.—Arizona Howler.

Going Shopping in Volapuk.

In Volapuk, the universal language, "ale-mobs" is the word for "to buy." That settles Volapuk hereabouts. No woman could bring herself to remark that she is going out for an afternoon's ale-mobbing.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Society's Classes.

Society is composed of two great classes, those who have more appetite than dinner, and those who have more dinner than appetite.—Chamfort.

It is far more easy to acquire a fortune like a knave than to expend it like a gentleman.—Colton.

Better to go to bed sleepless than to get up in debt.

FACE TO FACE.

If my face could only promise that its color would remain,
If my heart were only certain it would hide the moment's pain,
I would meet you and would greet you in the old familiar tone,
And naught should ever show you the wrong that you have done.

If my trembling hand were steady, if my smiles had not all fled,
If my eyes spoke not so plainly of the tears they often shed,
I would meet you and would greet you at the old sweet resting place,
And perchance you'd deem me happy if you met me face to face.

If the melody of springtide awoke no wild refrain,
If the autumn's golden burthen awoke no living pain,
I would meet thee and would greet thee as years ago we met,
Before our hearts were shipwrecked on the ocean of regret.

If my woman's soul were stronger, if my heart were not so true,
I would long have ceased remembering the love I had for you,
But I dare not meet or greet thee in the old familiar way,
Until we meet in heaven, when tears have passed away.
—Mary Mark Lemon in Temple Bar.

HER HUSBAND.

It is now over four years since I, Elizabeth Graves, first met Dora Hamilton. It was at Nice, on a brilliant day in February. I had just recovered from a sharp attack of typhoid fever and had been sent to the Riviera by my physician to complete my convalescence. One of his prescriptions was a drive every day when the weather was fine, and it was strictly followed. I enjoyed beyond measure my excursions in the environs of the city, the glorious sunshine, the vivid azure of sea and sky, the rich vegetation—in fact, all those elements that cause Nice to resemble a set scene in some magnificent theatrical spectacle. But I was far from strong, and could endure but little fatigue, and one afternoon my drive was prolonged far beyond the point that was either healthful or prudent. My driver lost his way, and after circulating about through various unknown roads for a long time, he finally brought me out on the heights of Cimiez, about half an hour after sunset. I was chilled and exhausted, and seeing the lights shining in the windows of a superb villa embowered in palms and orange trees near which we were passing, I called to the coachman to stop, and sent my maid in to ask the lodgekeeper for a glass of wine. This was brought by a kind hearted, motherly looking old woman, who, seeing my pallor and my half fainting condition, insisted upon my alighting and coming in to rest. I was so spent and weary that it was impossible for me to refuse. I was scarcely installed, however, when a handsome equipage dashed through the gates, there was a brief parley between the lodgekeeper and the new arrivals, and a lady entered the little room where I was seated, all eager kindness and hospitality, who introduced herself as Mrs. Hamilton, the tenant of the villa.

I must come at once to the house, she said, impulsively. I had been ill? Then I must wait and rest, and take some refreshment. And her brother, Dr. Somers, was a physician, and would know exactly what to do for me. My own carriage could come back for me later—that is, if it would not be best for me to stay all night. So, half coaxing half compelling, she hurried me into her landau, and I found myself in a few minutes safely ensconced in an arm chair in the elegant drawing room of the Villa Vittoria (so called because the crown princess of Russia had once spent a week there), with wine and biscuits and tea set out on a little table beside me, and a bright fire blazing on the hearth.

Dr. Somers, a tall, grave looking gentleman, came in, felt my pulse, and declared that I was in need only of a few hours of thorough repose. And then I took a good look at the lady who had so suddenly and unexpectedly become my hostess.

I think she was one of the loveliest women I have ever seen in all my life. She was not positively beautiful, but she was exquisitely graceful, with a tall, slender figure that reminded me in its liteness and swaying movements, of the stem of a calla lily. Her features were delicate and finely cut, her eyes most lovely, being large and transparent, of a soft yet lustrous gray. Her complexion had the pearly whiteness and varying blush rose tints of a person in fragile health; and indeed her whole aspect gave the impression of one that had suffered much and patiently endured. It is impossible for me to give by description an idea of the fascination of her manner, or the peculiar sweetness of her low, musical voice, that seemed to hold a caress in each of its melodious tones. She wore an elegant costume in gray crepe de Chine, and a bonnet trimmed with clusters of pale tinted violets; and the refinement and delicacy of her aspect appeared to be continued in her attire.

I had never heard of Mrs. Hamilton, and Nice is not precisely the place where it is safe to form haphazard acquaintances, but it was impossible for me to resist the winning charm of that fair lady's voice and manner. I introduced myself as well as I was able, though she declared that no constation of my identity was necessary, and after she had laid aside her bonnet, she came back and sat down beside me, and began to talk with the naive frankness of a child.

"We have come to Nice for the winter, my husband and I," she said, "for Edgar is delicate and cannot endure the cold of America or the dampness of Paris. In fact, his health gives me much uneasiness, and requires constant watchfulness and attention. Fortunately my brother is a physician, and he resides with us and travels with us, and takes every possible care of Mr. Hamilton. Of course, I assist him as much as possible, but Edgar's condition is so very precarious and causes me so much anxiety, that I should never know a moment's peace if I did not have a medical adviser constantly at hand. We never go into society and receive few visits, for I am not very strong myself, and my husband needs all my care and attention I can devote to him. He seldom comes down stairs but I wish he would do so this evening, for I should like to introduce him to you. Perhaps he has decided to dine with us this evening, and then that would be very pleasant."

She called to a servant, who had come to remove the tray: "Jules, go upstairs and see if Mr. Hamilton will be able to come down this evening."

The servant, an elderly, grave looking man, vanished, and speedily returned with the message that Dr. Somers did not consider it prudent for Mr. Hamilton to leave his room.

"Ah well," said Mrs. Hamilton, with a smile, "it would not do for him to be imprudent. But I should have been so pleased to present Edgar to you—he is so handsome and so intelligent, and such a brilliant conversationalist. However, here is his picture, and you can judge from that how very good looking he is, apart from my conjugal prejudices," she added, with a blush as swift and vivid as though she were a newly betrothed maiden, instead of a wife of many years' standing.

The picture that she put into my hand was a beautiful photograph on ivory, colored and finished as a miniature. It represented a singularly fine looking man, with blue eyes and blonde hair and mustache, but the eyes had a sinister gleam in their depths, and the full, red lips were sensual and coarse in outline and in expression. Moreover, the face was that of a much younger man than I had expected to see. Mrs. Hamilton, charming as she was, was evidently not far from 40 years of age, and the photograph of her husband was certainly that of a man under 30. There was no trace of ill health visible in the high colored, handsome face of the picture; so, after inspecting it for some moments, I asked: "Is this a recently taken likeness, Mrs. Hamilton? It does not look like the portrait of any one who had ever been ill."

"No; that is true," she took the photograph from my hand and seemed troubled, and also, to my astonishment, a little bewildered. "It was taken before we were married—twenty years ago. He has never had any other photograph taken since, and he will not sit to an artist. I cannot tell why, for to me he is always the same, 'Edgar! my Edgar!' And she pressed the picture to her lips, the tears streaming down her cheeks as she did so.

I was infinitely amazed at her emotion, which seemed to me so needless, and I was distressed at having unwittingly caused it, especially as I had not the faintest idea of how to proceed in order to soothe her. Just then, to my infinite relief, the door opened and Dr. Somers entered. Taking the miniature from Mrs. Hamilton's hand, he said to her, gravely: "My dear Dora, you are very foolish to let yourself become nervous and hysterical. You will be unable to sing to Edgar this evening if you do not cease sobbing and try to recover your voice."

"It was very foolish of me, Mark," replied Mrs. Hamilton, smiling up at him through her tears, "and Mrs. Graves must consider me a very absurd person, but you know whenever I think of poor Edgar's precarious health I am apt to break down utterly. Are you sure he is no worse than usual this evening?"

"Not a particle—rather better, in fact; but you can come and see for yourself, presently. Mrs. Graves will excuse you for a few moments, I am sure."

Just at that moment my carriage was announced, and I gladly availed myself of that excuse for taking leave at once, resisting all the hospitable entreaties of Mrs. Hamilton that I would stay and dine, if I could remain all night; for I could not but feel that I was in the way, as indeed any guest, it seemed to me, would have been under the roof that sheltered so beloved, and all absorbing an invalid as Mr. Hamilton evidently was.

I called a few days later to return thanks to my kind hostess for her hospitable care, and also to restore to her the numerous wraps and rugs in which she had insisted on enveloping me for my homeward drive. I did not see Mrs. Hamilton, however. Dr. Somers received me in her stead, and excused his sister on the ground that she was then in attendance on her husband. And as I crossed the hall I heard a voice of exquisite sweetness, that I readily recognized as that of Mrs. Hamilton, pouring forth its delicate notes in a scarcely known melody by Gounod.

"What a charming voice!" I remarked. "It is a pity that so fine a talent should be entirely lost to the world."

"My sister spends a great deal of time in singing to the invalid and also in reading to him," answered the doctor; "and she is happier in her self devotion than the praise and applause of society could make her."

After that day I had occasional glimpses of Mrs. Hamilton as her carriage passed mine during my daily drives. She never failed to lean forward and greet me with a pretty, eager gesture, and one of her sweet, pathetic smiles; but that was all that I ever saw of her. Her carriages were only left by her footman at the hotel for me, and greatly as I had been attracted by her, I shrank from again intruding on the privacy of that jealously guarded home.

There was evidently something mysterious about the malady and the seclusion of Mr. Hamilton. Gossip at Nice ran riot on the subject, and suggested all sorts of solutions for the riddle. One was that the invalid was not ill, but was simply insane; the constant presence of Dr. Somers and the peculiar taciturnity and reticence of the servants in the face of questions, and—must it be added?—even of bribes, being alleged in support of the theory. Then more malicious persons declared that Mrs. Hamilton was an adventuress who concealed a whole troop of lovers under the identity of the one unseen invalid; but that wicked report was speedily silenced, having no foundation in probability as it had none in fact. The explanation of the matter which I was inclined to consider correct was, that Mr. Hamilton had been disfigured for life by injuries received in some accident or other shortly after his marriage, and shrank from permitting strangers to look upon his mangled and distorted features. This theory was corroborated in my own mind by the tears Mrs. Hamilton had shed over her husband's miniature, and by his refusal to come down stairs while I was in the house.

The month of March had passed away, and the Riviera was flashing forth into all the brightness of early spring. When, one day, on my way home from an afternoon reception, I chanced to pass the Villa Vittoria, and was surprised to observe that the usually tranquil and solitary house was the center of a universal commotion. Servants were hurrying to and fro, groups of people hung about the lodge gate, talking and gesticulating, and within the sunlit windows of the distant villa might be observed a stir and confusion altogether foreign to the usual customs of the house. I sent my servant to inquire the cause of the excitement, and the lodgekeeper's aged wife came hurrying out herself to impart her tidings. They were both tragic and distressing. Mrs. Hamilton had gone out for an early drive to Montorone. Her horses had taken fright whilst descending the mountain, had run away and had overturned the carriage. The unfortunate lady was thrown out and was injured so terribly that her life was despaired of. Dr. Somers, who had accompanied her, had escaped with some slight bruises, and had been able to superintend the removal of his sister to her home.

"He has been watching over her ever since, madam," continued the old woman, "and he sent far and near for the best doctors in Nice, but they did not stay long when they came, and I am afraid the poor lady is dying."

Acting on my first impulse, I sprang from my carriage and hastened to the villa. The sound of voices guided me to the room of the sufferer. I passed on the threshold of the open door, but Dr. Somers, who was seated by his sister's bed, looked up and saw me, and signed to me, without speaking, to enter. Mrs. Hamilton did not notice me, and I do not think she was even aware of my presence. Her fair face was uninjured, but the pale shadow of approaching death rested upon her features and dimmed the luster of her beautiful eyes. She was pleading with her brother as I arrived, and she went on with her piteous prayer as I approached the bed.

"I know that I am dying, Mark," wailed the melancholy tones, still so sweet amid their feebleness. "Call Edgar—do call Edgar—let me see him once more before I go! I cannot die happy unless I look again on his dear face. It cannot hurt him more than the news of my death will do. Oh, Mark—dear Mark—do tell Edgar to come to me!"

Without a word, Dr. Somers arose and flung wide open a door opposite to that by which I had entered, and which led to an inner room, all inundated with the golden glory of the April sunset. The whole interior of the apartment thus disclosed was visible to me from where I stood. There were flowers everywhere; and pictures, and books, and exquisite trifles of all kinds, were visible on every side; but there was no human being to be seen within.

With the opening of the door a sudden change passed over the features of the dying woman. The light returned to her eyes, and a faint color tinged her pale face, as, half raising herself on her pillows, she fixed her eager gaze on a point near the foot of the bed. There was no one there—she spoke to empty space—but never shall I forget the pathetic tones of her voice, the loving tenderness of her fixed, dilated eyes.

"I knew you would come to me, Edgar," she panted. "It is hard to say good-by—we have loved each other so fondly, and you will miss me sadly, dear husband. But do not mourn for me—it will not seem long—our separation—after all. And think what it would have been for me had you died and left me alone in the world. I should have gone mad with grief, I think—but now—I go—to sleep—to dream of you—and when I wake you will be beside me—Edgar—my Edgar!"

She made a gesture as if to stretch out her arms toward the invisible being to whom she spoke—a spasm crossed her features, a rush of blood came to her lips, and she fell back upon her pillows. Dr. Somers bent over her, hearkened for a second and then pressed a lingering kiss upon her brow.

"All is over, Mrs. Graves," he said, as he raised his head. "Dora is with her husband."
Before the doctor left Nice he paid me a long visit, to thank me, as he said, for the interest I had manifested in his sister, and also to explain to me the riddle of her seemingly mysterious existence. The brother and sister had been left orphans at an early age, and each in possession of a handsome fortune. Some twenty years before, Dora Somers, then a very young and sensitive and affectionate girl, had been captivated by the showy graces and handsome person of Edgar Hamilton, an adventurer and gambler of conspicuously evil character. She loved him passionately, and became his wife in the teeth of the opposition of all her relatives. Immediately after the wedding the young couple started on a journey to Niagara Falls and Canada. A broken rail hurled the train on which they were traveling into wreck and disaster. Mr. Hamilton was instantly killed, and his bride received sundry severe injuries, chiefly on the head. She was ill for many weeks, and, on her recovery, it became evident that her reason was irretrievably shaken. She was possessed by the idea that her husband was still living, and that he was constantly with her. She shaped all her existence by his imaginary requirements; and would talk to him, and sing to him, and read to him, precisely as though he were really present. Her brother, with noble self devotion, gave up his whole life to the care of this gentlest of maniacs.

"And, thanks to my watchful affection, Mrs. Graves," continued the doctor, "she led a happy and peaceful life. Her Edgar—not the scamp that she married, but the bright creation of her own loving fancy—was always with her. The real Edgar, had he lived, would have rendered her fond, sensitive nature unspeakably wretched. She escaped all the sorrows of such a union; and I cannot but fancy that she and the visionary spouse that she loved and tended for so many years are now united, where, beyond these voices, there is peace."—Lucy H. Hooper in Frank Leslie's.

Stanford's University and Coeducation.

I asked as to the Stanford university, and Senator Stanford showed me some of the photographs of the buildings as they are today. He has photographs sent him every month showing the progress of the building, and these last photographs show that it is only a little above the foundation. The design of this university is in the shape of three quadrangles and it will have a half mile of covered colonnades. The only high feature of the building is the chapel tower, and the design is Spanish. The building will consist of a series of long, low halls. As I understand it, the university is to cover an area of about 600 feet by 300 feet, which would be about an acre and a half more than that covered by the Capitol at Washington. There are about 6,000 acres of ground about the college building, and, it is said, though I do not get the facts from Senator Stanford, that the gift of the university in round numbers amounts to $20,000,000. In this gift is included the 83,000 acres of good California land which is given to the university.

I asked Senator Stanford as to the coeducation of the sexes, and he told me that women would be admitted to the university as well as men, and he said he thought at least 25 per cent. could be added to the productive power of the United States by the women of the United States entering those occupations for which they were fitted, and that without their undertaking any profession or business which would be unwomanly or distasteful to them. He said he thought the future of the laboring classes lay in such education as would fit them to take advantage of their surroundings, and that the raw materials of the world were great enough to provide all the citizens of the world with all the comforts of life, and the luxuries, too, if those citizens brought invention to their aid and applied their labor in the right direction. He referred to the McCormick reaper, which now enables a farmer to cut, thresh and sack 100 pounds of wheat for a cent and a half a sack, and said that California alone could raise enough food to feed the whole United States.—Carpenter's Interview with Senator Stanford.

A Heavy Weight of Smoke.

The investigations of a society formed in London to abate the smoke nuisance afforded rather a startling idea of the wasteful extravagance of the present system of combustion. Here is a summary of a late report of the Smoke Abatement Institute: The weight of the smoke cloud over the city is estimated at about fifty tons of solid carbon and 250 tons of hydrocarbon and carbonic oxide gases. From actual tests, the value of coal actually wasted through the obstinacy of the Cocksney is £2,257,500, or 42 per cent. of the amount expended for coal in London, that being the percentage of heat that escapes up chimney without warming anybody. This waste also causes a useless expenditure of £268,750 for carting coal, to say nothing of the wear and tear of streets and of £43,000 more for carting away ashes.

Altogether, about £3,500,000 is yearly thrown away in London. Add to this £2,60,000 for injury to property from the smoke laden atmosphere, and there is shown a total of £4,500,000 which London annually loses because of its failure to burn coal under proper conditions. Nearly all this waste and smoke could be prevented by a general adoption of improved methods of constructing chimneys, fireplaces, furnaces and heaters.—Safety Valve.

Following the Fashion.

"Fairbanks is getting awfully fat."
"That's only a tendency of the times."
"How so?"
"He is recivilizing himself into a corporation."—Puck.