

Houseflies have no teeth. Everything they eat must be liquefied. If a housefly wants to eat something solid, such as a sugar crystal, it must first dissolve the food with saliva. Then it can suck the liquid up its proboscis. The proboscis is a hollow tube that extends out of its mouth.

Houseflies eat all kinds of things—manure, garbage, human food and dead, decaying animals. That's why it's important to keep houseflies away from your food; they can leave behind germs.
