Advisory from 1B

coast had the most arsenic; clams on the south coast had the least arsenic; clams on the central coast were in between.

Those planning to eat soft-shell clams with siphon skins intact should review the OHA's recommended meal limits, which are available at www.healthoregon.org/fishadv.

The advisory does not include other species of shellfish. In addition to soft-shell clams, DEQ tested Olympia oysters (a native species of oyster), California mussels, and purple varnish clams, and determined these species are not of concern.

The tests looked for a wide range of potential contaminants, including other metals such as cadmium, mercury, and selenium; chlorinated pesticides like DDT and chlordane; polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs); dioxins and furans; tributyl tin; and brominated flame retardants (polybrominated diphenyl ethers, or PBDEs).

None of these other contaminants were present at high enough concentrations to pose a public health risk.

Public health officials say that since the arsenic contaminating the clams is naturally occurring, the advisory is likely to be permanent.

By issuing the advisory, health officials hope to increase

NED HICKSON/SIUSLAW NEWS

The Oregon Health Department advisory issued Monday for soft-shell clams is an effort to reduce exposure to known contaminants when possible.

the public's awareness of shellfish species to be avoided, those to keep eating, and ways to reduce exposure to known contaminants when possible.

While it is important for people to know about contaminants in shellfish, it is equally important to keep shellfish on the table. Health officials continue to encourage everyone to eat a variety of shellfish as part of a healthy diet.

"Because eating shellfish and other aquatic species can be an important part of a healthy diet, we want people to continue eating shellfish," said toxicologist David Farrer, Ph.D., of OHA's Public Health

Division. "If they plan to consume soft-shell clams, we just recommend they remove the siphon skin before eating them."
