DISTRACTED DRIVING | USING TECHNOLOGY SAFELY COMING UP ON SATURDAY JULY 25: OTHER DISTRACTIONS | PHONE CONVERSATIONS

GPS Devices

What's the point of knowing exactly where you're going if you're not going to make it there safely?

GPS navigation units help us traverse parts unknown. If you keep your unit map updated, it can help you circumvent high-construction zones or even major traffic jams.

Can you imagine making a cross-country trip without one?

Although GPS units are invaluable to today's drivers, tinkering with them is one of the leading roadway distractions today. It takes time to program the right address or business name into the unit — time that can take away from you paying attention to the road.

While GPS devices are covered under many distracted-driving laws, how you use them may not be. If you're depending on your smartphone to run a map application, police officers may pull you over if it looks like you're using your phone for a conversation.

WHEN TO PROGRAM YOUR GPS UNIT

If you depend on your GPS to find your destination, program your target address before you leave the house or have a passenger help. If you plan to make multiple stops along the way, plan your route and program all possible stops.

MOUNT THE GPS

If you keep your device mounted securely to your dash, you may be less apt to use it while driving. Always pull over safely to a gas station or rest stop to program your unit if you're driving by yourself.

This gives you the opportunity to fully focus on input-ting the correct destination address, without the added stress of dealing with traffic signs and other drivers.

Many new cars offer on-board GPS units that allow you to speak your directions aloud. This can help you keep your eyes on the road while your unit handles your travel logistics for you.
