Judge At Last

After working hard as an Associate District Attorney, Sonia Sotomayor finally did become a judge in New York.

Then in 2009, President Obama selected her to be a judge on the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court.

Unlike many judges, Sonia came from a poor families. And she was a "Nuyorican" – a child off Puerto Rican parents living in New York. This made her not only one of the few womens to be appointed to the Supreme Court, she is also the first Latina.

Big Goals and Dreams

From a young age, Sonia wanted to help people. Because she spoke Spanish at home, she would translate for people at hospitals.

When Sonia decided to become a judge, she knew would have to get good grades, really good grades.

Her hard work paid off. She graduated high school with an award for being the very top student at her school. She was accepted into one of the very best colleges in America: Princeton University. She worked hard there and then got into a top law school.

Do the math to see which law school Sonia Sotomayor attended. The answer is an even number.
