EDUCATION NEWS & NOTES

A Great Way To Tap Into A Hot Job Sector

(NAPSA)—If you or someone you know is exploring careers that make a difference, consider the fast-growing field of professional health communication.

As the health care industry continues to dominate the U.S. economy, the market demand for health communicators has grown quickly. Those with master's degrees constitute the core of this increasingly popular profession. As the World Health Organization (WHO) put it, "Health communicators have a unique opportunity to provide meaningful input in improving and saving lives."

The Problem:
Not many people know that they can get a degree in professional health communication studies or how to go about it.

An Answer:
To make it easier for working professionals to earn advanced credentials in the health communication field, Boston University Metropolitan College offers a fully online Master of Science in Health Communication (MSHC) program.

Admission to the program, which has received global and national recognition for outstanding work, is handled on a rolling basis throughout the year.

Expert's Opinion
"Health care is personal and it touches everyone," said Leigh Curtin-Wilding, Program Director for Boston University's Online Health Communication Graduate Program. "Considering today's pace of technological advances, scientific breakthroughs, the needs of an aging population and other trends up ahead, how can consumers and patients be assured they're making the best choices for their health? Who will advocate for the unmet needs of at-risk populations? The chances are high that a professional health communicator will be involved in this work."

Health Care Is Big
According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, employment for all health care occupations is expected to grow 18 percent through 2026 and add more jobs than any other occupational group. Professional health communication opportunities are found at federal, state and local agencies, public relations and marketing agencies, hospitals and commercial organizations, consulting firms, health insurance companies and many other areas.
