THE STAR ROUTE RING DOOMED

Thomas L. James was made Postmaster-General despite the Star Route Ring. Its scheme was to have a subservient man appointed, with an ex-Police Commissioner of the city of New York as second assistant. James went in with the avowed purpose of cleaning out the Department and of making it self-supporting. His experience in the New York Postoffice had convinced him that the department could not only be made to pay expenses, but to return a revenue to the Government. An examination of the records in the contract office disclosed the operations of the Ring. The corruption through collusion with Federal officials was laid bare. Contractors who had tried to do business honestly had been frozen out. It was clear that money had been paid for the awarding of the contracts. It was evident that the Sixth Auditor's office of the Treasury Department was controlled by the conspirators. All the accounts of the Postal Department passed through that office.

The result of Postmaster-General James's preliminary examination was laid before Attorney-General MacVeagh. It astonished him. The two Cabinet officers immediately went to the White House. They found the President in the library, and laid the result of their researches before him. He carefully went over every detail. The interview lasted several hours. The President finally said: "I direct you to probe this ulcer to the bottom and to cut it out."

From that day to this the work has gone on without interruption. No leniency has been shown to any one. It has been a work of great magnitude. Many experts have been employed in gathering evidence from the records and elsewhere. Every one of the manipulated routes has been inspected by impartial men, who have spent months in the work. Witnesses have been examined and conclusive evidence of the rascality has been obtained. For two months preceding the assassination of the President every effort was made to induce him to stop the investigation. He was told that it would injure the party, and smirch some of his warmest political and personal friends. Men were paid to make affidavits against the character of the men engaged in the investigation. A plot was made to encompass the removal of the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General, and false statements were manufactured to influence the mind of the President against them. General Garfield stood firm, and the conspirators showered him with the vilest abuse. The reports that any attempt to control the investigation are false.
