The Irish Question. THE present struggle now going on in Ireland between armed power and coercion on one hand, and delayed justice on the other, is attracting the attention of the world. The people who for seven centuries have fought against oppression are now making a demand unprecedented, and adopting a course undeniably politic. The cause of Irish independence is on trial before humanity, and it must be admitted that their present system of warfare is more conducive to success, more indicative of ultimate triumph than any since the days when "Silken Thomas flung King Henry's sword on couneil board, the English thanes among." Macaulay once sarcastically described the Irish as "a people who were more interesting than prosperous;" and a more modern epigrammatist defines them as "a people who govern all countries but their own." To be an independent nation, to govern themselves, is the ultimate object of the "no rent," and "justice" agitation that now makes of that generations of persecution and could be fought out in the prosecution, of subjection and suspension, of cruel wrong and merciless oppression, have been unable to subdue their spirits or dispel their dream of liberty. This country has stood "the Niobe of nations." When other lands were rejoicing in the light of liberty, she sorrowfully laid away her banner the sun-burst, and hoped on. From the days of Henry II and Strongbow, down through seventy decades, till now in these closing lustrams of the nineteenth century she asks for tardy recognition of | Ir has been fairly demonstrated | | her claims. So far as the issues upon the question arena of civil strife, they were settled at an early day under his national leadership. It was his restless logic that conquered in debate. Out of the depths of his matchless eloquence also flows like a never-ceasing inspiration the true music of the union.
