This would allow him a fortnight at Washington to rest himself before commencing his journey home. As a considerable part of the way was over rugged mountains, covered a greater portion of the year with a great depth of snow, traveling at the rate of thirty miles a day was a hard duty. Yet a youg able-bodied senator might travel from Oregon to Washington and back once a year, but he could do nothing else. He might come more expeditiously, however by water, around Cape Horn, or through Behring's Straits round the northern coast of this continent to Baffin's Bay, thence through Davis Straits to the Atlantic, and so on to Washington. It was true this passage had not yet been discovered, except on our maps, but it would be as soon as Oregon would become a State."

Mr. Dickerson concluded by moving that the bill be laid on the table, which motion prevailed.
