ASTORIA OREGON: SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1882

F. HALLORAN, Editor. As We See It.

An article on Ingersoll in last Sunday's issue, in which that individual was alluded to as a plagiarist, started a discussion in relation to the merits of the whole system of religious teaching.

And so we welcome all helps to growth, spiritual or intellectual—care not whence they come—whether from saint or sinner, Jew or Gentile, Pagan or Christian.

But the matter of free thought is a world-embracing one. As a general thing, men ought to grow wiser as they grow older.

It may be, and is held by most free thinkers, that if all religious teaching was supplemented by proper instruction in the laws of health, sobriety, and right living—that if science was made to take the place of faith and revelation—better general results would follow than are now witnessed.

He who derides all church influences and religious teachings would hardly care to reside in a community where there were no such influences and teachings—unless he were permitted to select his neighbors, which would scarcely be possible.

The human race is still in its infancy—is only beginning to walk.

It needs all the helps and encouragements of religion as well as science to keep it from stumbling; and they are not always sufficient.

And so we welcome all helps to growth, spiritual or intellectual—care not whence they come—whether from saint or sinner, Jew or Gentile, Pagan or Christian.

In Memoriam.

THE thousands who have read his works with pleasure and delight will feel a personal loss in the news that Henry W. Longfellow died at Boston last Friday morning.

To those three American poets our country owes much of its present literary ability. When it was fashionable to sneer at American authors and ape the sickly sentimentality of Byron and the soft nothings of "L. E. L.," Bryant, Longfellow and Whittier found in the woods and waters of their own land inspiration that was breathed in the loftiest numbers.
