Chemistry of Life and Death.

To a reflecting mind the changes wrought by death—the dissolution of the grave,—should have no more of horror, of repulsion, than should those equally marvelous processes by which the phenomena of life are maintained.

Beginning with the chemistry of life—with that universal instinct which from the first moment of conscious existence is collecting from every quarter the needed nutrition: which hides within tissues and integuments the alchemy by which that process of decomposition called digestion, is carried on;

M. to four o'clock P. M. of said day.

By the gasses to feed and to fill fields of waiting grain, the ripening fruits, the fragrant flowers; from the short companionship of death they take their flight, and away and afar they scatter to enter into new forms of life.

ONE thing Roscoe Conkling deserves to have said about him: with all his annoyance and laughter, men that sit so poorly on the stomachs of men who believe in republican simplicity, it must be said that he is strictly honest, and though time and again he has had the opportunity, not a dollar of ill gotten gain soils his hands.
