

The Daily Astorian.

ASTORIA, OREGON: TUESDAY, APRIL 18, 1882. J. F. HALLORAN, Editor.

How Not to Do It.

IN one of Dickens' admirable works—Bleak House—he caricatures an English institution which he styles "The Circumlocution office," the chief aim of that office being, apparently, to illustrate "How not to do it."

The intention of the monopolists, when they contrived the commission scheme of delay and indefinite postponement of reform, was to hurry the bill through Congress with as little discussion as possible.

Suppose the bill of the Senate to pass the House, as would be the case on a direct vote at this time, what would naturally happen afterward?

Mr. Morrill and Mr. Kelley are two of the most extreme protectionists we possess, and they believe in the doctrines which they preach.

Hence, with this power lodged in the hands of two chairmen, it is absurd to suppose there would be any serious attempt at legislation next session, even if the commissioners completed their task.

That would bring the question before Congress, if at all, on the eve of the two national conventions, and the Presidential election in November, 1884.

The commission bill, therefore, means in plain English, five or six hundred millions of profit for the monopolists during this period of delay, to be extorted from the taxpayers by a device of deception.

From the House appropriation for Indian service for the ensuing year it would seem as if the fewer Indians, the more it cost to take care of them.

THERE seems to be a strange fatality about Blaine's South American policy. It is not yet a year since its inception, and all the prominent actors in it on the part of the United States are dead; while Blaine, himself, is relegated to private life.

CATHOLIC journals authoritatively announce that the Pope has no intention to leave Rome for the purpose of establishing himself in any other European or American city.
