Two Astorias

Strolling past the Catholic church yesterday afternoon, and admiring the glorious panorama of an October day spread out below us, we thought under what different phases out-door life in Astoria presents itself.

The one is a noisy, busy, bustling port, where, amid wharves and docks, the rattling of chains and the shouts of the sailors are heard. Where flows the great Columbia, and anchored in the stream awaiting clearance to far-off England lie great ships wheel-laden. Where all day long the noise of traffic rolls, steamers coming and going with shrill shrieks. Where piling and plank-ing lie on every hand, and buildings in every stage of construction greet the eye in all directions, while underneath the streets surges the tide.

The other Astoria is a quiet-streeted place. The sidewalks are laid on terra firma. Before the houses are gardens bright with summer bloom, and carefully tended. Maples spread their branches and fruit trees thickly set appear above the paintings. The emerald turf upon the hillside gleams brightly. Family residences stand on every hand, from whose windows may be seen views of transcendent beauty. From the sunny slopes above the town, on rare October afternoons may be seen one of the prettiest sights in the northwest. On one of these delightful days when the air that lies still feels warm, and the moving air feels cool, when glowing in the brilliant livery of Autumn the trees, clothed in gold and scarlet, hang down their leaves, whose smooth cheeks, blushing at the sun's neglect, are crimsoning at the rude touch of the frost, the blue of the sky and the gold of the sunlight, sets off the white sailed ships that stand out in clear distinctness in the sunny air. The prettiest hour of such a day is at its close, when the stars on high come twinkling out from the infinite azure that hid them during the sun's reign, and answering "Here" to the recall of the Creator they form the celestial rank and file for the glorious procession of the night.
