1882. Harper's Weekly.

congress, Jay Hubbell approached John White, the sole Republican representative from Kentucky, and in a menacing manner said: "I will beat you, sir! I will beat you!" This threat was launched because White had dared to oppose the wishes of the imperious Hubbell. White invited Hubbell to do his worst. He became the candidate of the Republicans of his district as their first and only choice. During the canvass, which he conducted personally on the stump, White frequently referred to Hubbell's threat, and appealed from the dictator to the people, at the same time denouncing Hubbell and his methods. Although opposed by Matt Adams, an able and popular Democrat, White was elected by a decisive majority, hundreds of Democrats giving him their votes as the most direct way to rebuke Hubbell and the methods he introduced into the canvass. In pronounced Republican districts all over the country the party was beaten on Hubbell's account, but here is a Republican elected in a Democratic district to rebuke him.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says:

It is understood that Secretary Lincoln will recommend a slight increase of the army, but congress is not likely to appreciate his arguments. No more Indian wars are anticipated. The settlement of most of the western country by the whites has progressed far enough to render outbreak on the part of Indians unlikely. The strength of the savages appears thoroughly overthrown, and with the exception of little marauding bands along the Mexican border, no further trouble is expected. The reasons for the increase of the army are that the disciplinary entirety of the army is not large enough to give officers the requisite practice in handling troops. The secretary is also likely to recommend that the pay of soldiers be raised from thirteen to sixteen dollars a month, the old figure. The policy of the secretary will be to consolidate the different commands as near as possible, and to abandon all the little posts in order to get soldiers enough together to make a respectable showing. It is said the secretary will dwell at some length upon the subject of desertion. Last year sixteen per cent of the enlisted men deserted, and to fill their places it cost the department $370,000. A large number of men are constantly enlisting from the east, and who simply desire transportation to some far western territory with the intention of deserting as soon as they get there, which they proceed to do upon arrival at their destination.

Nothing but the most ample corroboration of the fact will prove to the average human the truth of the statement now made that the French Duke of Gallier has given away every cent of his $12,000,000 fortune, to become a missionary to British Columbia. Comment upon such action is wholly affected by the point of view. In one sense it appears absolutely foolish; in the other grandly sublime. But they must, certainly, feel lonesome.

At a recent fire in Ottawa some one sent a telegram to the owner who was in Boston, saying: "Promises all on fire; what shall we do?" The answer came promptly: "Put it out."
