Tickets may be procured of members of the domestic missionary committee of the Episcopal church, died in the city of New York. This man had intimate relations with fifty bishops, and over three thousand clergymen and their congregations in the United States. His name was a household word with members of this communion in every state and territory in our country. He was so well known and highly esteemed in the city of New York, that the day before his death seventy-five clergymen, of different denominations, called at his door to inquire what hope there was of his life. His funeral services in New York were attended by two hundred clergymen and two thousand people, and when his remains were being borne to their last rest, in Lainsburg, every church bell in the town, including that of the Roman Catholics, rung a solemn peal of respect and reverence for his memory. Not one word of this is worthy of telegraphic notice, but the next day and the day after we have our full quantum of "turf news," murders, suicides, rapes and other startling information. Again, on the 20th of November occurred another notable death—in another department of life's work—that of Prof. Henry Draper, one of the most distinguished scientific men in the world. Dr. Draper's achievements, won from the congress of the United States its first recognition of a scientific discoverer, in the form of a gold medal in his honor, bearing the inscription, "He adds luster to ancestral glory." His early death, at the age of forty-five carried sorrow into the circles of science all over the world. But of all this the telegraph was ignorant and dumb. To make amends, however, it did the next day after the death of this illustrious man, gave the fifty millions of people in the United States the following important piece of information:

Gilbert Partrick, better known as Gilpatrick, the oldest living jockey in America, who rode Lexington, Lecomte and many other famous racers in this country, and Priores, Stark, Umpire and others in England, for Ten Broeck, is dying of pneumonia, at New York!

These are but samples of the character of our telegraphic news, which any day's reports will furnish. It is not to be wondered at then that a distinguished citizen said in a public assembly in New York, sometime since, that the telegraphic reports of the daily journals were a disgrace to our civilization."

THERE is a glimpse of statesmanship says the Call in the proposition which comes from New Orleans to adopt a continental policy in connection with the construction of a canal across the isthmus, and the improvements of the Mississippi river. The address of the New Orleans merchants contemplates a future when the United States will need a market for its products, and finds that market on the Pacific coast, both in North and South America. The completion of the Nicaragua canal is necessary to the control of this market. A continental policy requires not only the completion of the canal, but the establishment of American control over it. England took possession of the Suez canal because her interests prompted her to do so. England's interests might also prompt her to take possession of the Nicaragua canal if it is in such a condition that her war vessels can sail through it as they sailed through Suez.

measure in length over eight feet. And this is the sort of pabulum that is served out fifty-two times in the year, as news, by our best papers. Why is it that this picture of crime, with all its details and grossness, must daily be spread out before the whole world, and brought home to our sons and daughters, whose characters and habits of thought are largely formed by what they read. Aside from what is positively coarse and vulgar in this news of the day, much of it is so trivial and senseless that one is amazed that respectable journals are willing to lumber their columns with it, to the exclusion of sensible and edifying matter. Let me illustrate what is a common characteristic of our telegraphic news. On the 11th of November, the Rev. Dr. Twing, the secretary and general agent of the domestic missionary committee of the Episcopal church, died in the city of New York. This man had intimate relations with fifty bishops, and over three thousand clergymen and their congregations in the United States. His name was a household word with members of this communion in every state and territory in our country. He was so well known and highly esteemed in the city of New York, that the day before his death seventy-five clergymen, of different denominations, called at his door to inquire what hope there was of his life. His funeral services in New York were attended by two hundred clergymen and two thousand people, and when his remains were being borne to their last rest, in Lainsburg, every church bell in the town, including that of the Roman Catholics, rung a solemn peal of respect and reverence for his memory.
