

The Daily Astorian. ASTORIA, OREGON. TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1882.

"Yes, I went to church yesterday," said Job Shuttle with a yawn. "Pretty good sermon, pretty fair; but what pleased me most was the antics of an inch worm that was roaming about the hat of a lady who sat in front of me. That little, pale green incher reminded me so much of the way we human worms get on in the world. You see he was on the vane of the feather in the hat and he would get a good hold, and then reach up with his head and feel around and look the field over to see where he could make a good strike, just as a man looks for business; then he would throw himself and body on to a curl of the feather, which would bend and let him down with a thud, just like a man who has made a bad speculation; then he would wriggle and twist and feel around for a new hold, just like a man trying to "fix things" with his creditors; then he would mount to the very topmost summit of the hat and stick his head up and swing all around, just like a newly-elected congressman gazing over the heads of his constituents; finally he got along on the lower edge of the turned up hat brim and then he made progress; he inched along, making big strides right ahead, just like a man picking up money and making a fortune hand over fist; but the little incher was not satisfied. Just as he got as far as he could he "broke all up" and tumbled and we saw him no more; for all the world just like a man who has done his best for a little while and then "flunked."
