ASTORIA, OREGON:

TUESDAY ...... MARCH 13, 1883

Norman Lockyer tells us that he found at a little station in the Rocky mountains a French priest who was travelling round the world because, when preparing to die a few months before, the thought had come to him that he might be asked in Paradise what was his opinion of the world he had left; and he had not seen the world. Mr. Lockyer does not point out what he considers to be the moral of this pleasing story. The obvious moral is that death may and ought to be put off until one has travelled round the world, and this will commend itself to an overwhelming majority. Another and perhaps, in the opinion of Englishmen, a more satisfactory moral is that, France forming no part of God's beautiful world, no Frenchman can be supposed to have seen anything of the glories of nature who has seen only his own country. This was probably Mr. Lockyer's opinion, as it was that of the Rev. T. C. Upham, who found no room in his expansive soul in the forests of Fontaineblean, "where all was man," but sighed for the mighty woods of his native land, fresh from the hand of God-overlooking in his patriotic and pardonable pride the surprising speed with which the protective association of American lumbermen was converting these forests of his soul into merchantable boards.

When a writer has ideas for which there is no English he neary be excused using a foreign lan-
