

The Daily Astorian.

ASTORIA, OREGON:

FRIDAY, MARCH 15, 1883

ACCORDING to an official report lately published in the Marine Veordmungs Blatt, it is the opinion of German naval authorities that for the future an effective blockade has become impossible. The reasons given are that a fleet would always be obliged at sunset to seek the open sea, and to remain sufficiently far off to prevent torpedo boats issuing from the harbor coming up to the vessel in the darkness; and not even a single ship could be left on guard in sight of the port without the risk, almost amounting to certainty, of being sunk during the night, while the port would remain open not only to light and speedy cruisers, but to any ship whose entrance might be desired. Under such circumstances, the probability of a few torpedo boats lying hidden along the coast would, it is thought, be sufficient to paralyze the action of the most powerful squadron, and prevent the possibility of any serious operations.

In a recent political letter Jefferson Davis says: "You ask for my thoughts on 'The source of the right in the majority to rule.' I do not think there is such a right; if it were admitted, the only source I could suggest would be physical power; but it is not self-evident that the majority would be the stronger, and civilization denies that right and might are convertible terms. The people of an independent community could give to a majority the power to have unrestricted rule, but they could not transfer the inalienable right of the minority, and a brief experience would, no doubt, cause them to revoke the grant of a power so dangerous to the common welfare and happiness."

SIMON CAMERON says: "It was as a journalist that I began making the first steps out of obscurity. I can to-night readily call to mind the day when I first began, at twenty dollars a year, to learn the printing business—when that profession was new, when that business was in its infancy, when it took a day to do that which is now done in a minute."

A SALT LAKE dispatch says there is great activity along the Oregon Short Line railroad. It is the determination of the company to complete the line to Baker City, Oregon, this year. By April the first trains will be running through from Granger on the Union Pacific to the Wood river country over this line.
