

The Daily Astorian.

ASTORIA, OREGON: TUESDAY, MAY 29, 1883. Worth Considering.

Under the significant heading, "Opposition Possible," the Walla Union of the 25th has a cogent article discussing the feasibility of shipping Walla Walla wheat to the seaboard via the Columbia river.

For years before the construction by the O. R. & N. Co., of a railroad from Walla Walla to Portland, the commerce of the interior, says the Union, was carried on by steamboats on the Columbia river, and a narrow gauge railroad from the former city to the river.

It would not require a very heavy investment to again make the mighty Columbia swarm with boats. The government is slowly cutting a canal and building locks at the Cascades. But it will be, at the rate of progress in the past, many years before the locks and canal are ready to use.

The original road cost less than $10,000 a mile, and that too, when rails were sold for double the present prices. At present prices a first-class road, amply stocked, ought to be built from the city to the river for $250,000.

To sum up, in order to obtain opposition to the present monopoly it is necessary to expend: Cascade portage road, $20,000; Dulles portage road, $25,000; Walla Walla to Walla, $250,000.

Total, $355,000. THE ASTORIAN has always maintained that the proper route for the wheat of that great and fertile area of which Walla Walla is the commercial center, is down the Columbia, to land at Astoria in deep draught vessels for foreign shipment.

It is discussing that widening subject known as "woman's sphere" it may be mentioned that a national bank at Marion, Ia., and one at Raleigh, N. C., have woman presidents, and that Mrs. M. H. Galloway is president of the savings bank at Pon du Lac, Wis.; Sarah F. Dick, the cashier of the first national at Huntington, Ind.; Annie M. King, cashier of a bank at White Cloud, Kan.; Jennie Combs, cashier of a bank at Middletown, Mich., and Miss M. W. Bond, treasurer of the savings bank at Florence, Mass.

DEAD. April 10, 1883, in Harrison county, Indiana, Mrs. Mary C. Pate, sister of Mr. James Vaughn of this city.
