Secretary Teller has decided that lands cannot be withdrawn from the area of lands open to public settlement which are within what is known as the second indemnity limits in grants made to railroad companies. He holds that it was not the intention of congress, in extending the line outside of the first limits, to shut out settlers from these exterior limits. The condition of the indemnity extension, properly construed, is that the railroad company may go beyond the limits of the original grant to take such a quantity of land as will make up for any deficiency in the first grant. Thus, if a hundred sections of land had been taken by settlers, on the actual numbers within the original grant, the company might then go beyond and find the hundred sections within the indemnity limits. The railroad companies have been in the habit of withdrawing all the land in the indemnity or exterior ten-mile limit, and holding it as snugly as that within the original grant of forty miles, or twenty miles on either side of the track. Had this decision been made some years ago, it would have saved a vast deal of trouble to settlers, who will get a diminished benefit
