On the Northern Pacific road the finest day's trip is the first out from Portland, up the Columbia. The route follows the Columbia, from Portland to The Dalles, a distance of eighty-seven miles by rail. To the latter point the river has a width of one-half to twothirds of a mile. It runs with a very rapid current and mighty volume. It carries to the sea, though few are aware of that fact, nearly as great a body of water as Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, the Mississippi, the boasted Father of Waters. But the river is not the greatest attraction. The mountains which bound the river impress one the most. They are lofty, generally terraced and are mostly heavily timbered. They have bold bluffs, swelling outlines and are frequently top-finished by long lines of battlement-like ridges, sertineled by pine and fir everywhere. These long mountain stretches and circling river reaches are the finest I have ever seen. In addition, there are many miles of sheer basaltic cliffs, along the very face of which and on the brink of the river the railroad runs. These cliffs are four hundred to five hundred feet above the railroad. In several cases their summits overhang their base, apparently threatening a catastrophe to the railroad and a sudden filling in of that side of the river. The idea of battlements and fortresses is constantly suggested by the great elevated benches on the one hand and by the even lines of the summits on the other.

Aiusworth is putting a small steamer on the upper Columbia to carry supplies to the upper country for the civil engineers of the Canadian Pacific railroad and employes of a railroad company in which Capt.
