The boxes are now ready for the sealers. These men sit at long tables, and each one has a little stove and soldering iron at his side. The box is placed in a little grooved platform, which forms the top of a revolving frame, extending below the table and worked by the feet. The solder, in long, thin sticks or coils, is placed about half an inch above the end of the hot copper-pointed iron, and is rapidly melted, running down along the point and filling the groove. After slightly scratching with the point ply. of the copper a number or mark to indicate the sealer, whose identity is thereby established in case of bad work, the boxes are taken to an immense caldron, where the contents are boiled for two hours, thus completing the cooking process and dissolving the bones of the fish.

After boiling, the boxes are placed side by side, and a small hole is punctured in one corner in order to permit the air, which was necessarily sealed in the box, to escape. This sometimes comes with a sudden spurt. throwing a tiny stream of steam and hot oil in all directions. Immediately after this a boy seals the hole with solder, and the box is then placed with others in a revolving chamber partly filled with sawdust. A few Renz vs Renz. D. H. If it yields there is a hole somewhere, Court adjourned till nine o'clock through which air enters the box, or there is still some remaining air which turned to the sealer, who must pay the value of the box thus spoiled. The final handling is done when the sardines are packed in large wooden boxs for shipment.

Almost the entire product is shipped to New York, whence it is sold to retailers throughout the country. One of the establishments in Lubec prepares about four thousand boxesdaily. When it is remembered that there are nineteen such places in Eastport and many others at different seaport towns, the enormous consumption of the gentle herring masquerading unactual cost per box, including all expenses, is five cents. The profit made by the packers sometimes reaches seven and nine cents, but is oftener less. The difference between these prices and the consumer's expenditure is lost in the different hands through which the fish pass.
