One of the cheeriest signs of Asto ria's prosperity is the increasing number of houses. Attracted by our busness facilities, our genial climate, and evident future, numbers of people are looking out for permanent residences, while of the many who have looked upon Astoria as but a temporary place of residence, the great proportion have concluded that they cannot do better elsewhere.

Looked at as an abstract preposition, that is what keeps anyone where he is, that is what retains him in the position he then occupies, the realization that all things being considered he is doing better where he is than he centrated would do elsewhere. It is one of the most important motives of human action, and underlies every movement in
