BEAR STORIES AND NEW RUM.

Some eighty years ago there lived in a small log house at Peltoma Point, at Pittsfield, Mass., a man by the name of Inman. My grandfather, when I was a small boy, showed me the sight of the old house and told me the following story as true: In-man was too lazy to hunt much, but would bang around all day for a drink of rum and tell bear stories. At this time bears were quite plenty in this region and often troubled our sheep and corn. One fall a nervous, quick stranger came to Col Lancey's tavern from Boston to kill a few bears. He from Boston to kill a few bears. He stepped up to the bar and called for a drink (this, be it remembered, was was way back toward "the good old colony times when we were under the king," and new rum was sold openly for only 3 cents a glass), and inquired where he could go to shoot a bear.

This brought Inman to the front—bears? He knew! The very man the stranger wanted. "Will you take a drink?" Yes, he would. After telling his wondrous feats in slaughtering bears, and taking several drinks, the stranger said: "Mr. Inman, how large a bear did you ever see?" Up to this time the admiration was mutual; the stranger had furnished the tual; the stranger had furnished the rum and dinner, and Inman the bears. "Well, sir, the biggest bear I ever see, I killed in 1801. You see I had a fine piece of corn on the side of the hill, and when it got full in the milk a bear began to break it down. milk a bear began to break it down. I watched him three nights to shoot him, but he kept away. I guess he knew me. Well, be that as it may, I took my ax and started out to make a took my ax and started out to make a bear trap, for when I don't fetch him one way I try another, and there was Mr. Bear breaking down my corn at a great rate. I started for him and he ran down the hill between two rows of corn, and gained on me every minute till he came to the fence, which was seven feet high, and jumped clear over it into a great snow drift, and went into it all out of sight, and when he poked his head out of the snow I knocked him over with my ax."

"Mr. Inman, that was a queer coun "Mr. Inman, that was a queer country where you lived. Corn in the milk on one side the fence, and a great snow drift on the other." Old Inman stopped and scratched his head, with a puzzled look, and said, very slowly, "I guess, Mister, I have got holt of parts of two stories."

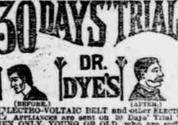

Children Should Read Newspapers. Every home in our land should be furnished with a supply of good newspapers. There are no other means by which knowledge can be gained and so universally diffused. If parents would encourage their children to read the newspapers, by taking one or more of them into their families, they would very soon dis-cover how much faster their stock of knowledge would increase. Books you may have in abundance—and they are good in their way—but they soon become montonous, and are like an old song to a child, while the newspaper coming in fresh every day or week, is always looked for-ward to with pleasure, even impati-ence, as a promised present, and read it with an eagerness unthought of in the perusal of a book. There is no man so poor in this age of cheap newspapers, that he cannot afford at least his home paper.
